As exquisitely sheer as embroidered net are the allover English eyelet frocks which are the last word flashed from fashion's headquarters. Not only are the white and cream colored eyelet fabrics used, but the mode especially stresses sheer openwork embroideries in pastel tones. These are often trimmed in lace, for unusual is the frock which escapes at least a touch of lace. Indeed, there is no item that is more important in the list of summer dress mediums than lace.

Colored laces for evening gowns are in extreme favor. Beige lace frocks are ideal for afternoon wear. A monotone effect is usually carried out, the beige ensemble brightened by effective touches of tangerine.

Lesson for July 20

THE BAPTISM OF JESUS

LESSON TEXT—Mark 1:1-11.

GOLDEN TEXT—"Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."—Mark 1:11.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Pleases His Father.

JUNIOR TOPIC—John and Jesus at the Jordan.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Jesus Dedicates His Life.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Meaning of Baptism.

In order to appreciate the lesson for today one should have an understanding of the purpose of the Gospel according to Mark. In the Old Testament is set forth an august portrait of Jesus Christ Who is the Branch, the King (Jer. 23:5), the Branch, the Servant (Zech. 3:8), the Branch, the Man (Zech. 6:12), the Branch of Jehovah (Isa. 4:2). The four-fold account of the Gospels placed alongside of these predictions fits exactly. Matthew exhibits Him as the Promised King, Mark as the Servant of Jehovah, Luke as the Man Redeemer and John as the Son of God. The theme of Mark is the Gospel of Jehovah's Servant (Chap. 1:1). The key verse is 10:45, and the key words are "straightway," "forthwith," "immediately."

I. Who the Servant Is (v. 1).

"Jesus Christ, the Son of God." Jesus means Saviour. Christ means Anointed. This Servant who so fully and completely obeys God's will is none other than God's Son.

II. The Servant's Forerunner (vv. 2-8).

1. Who He Was (vv. 2-3). He was John the Baptist. His mission was to prepare the way for God's Servant. He was prophesied concerning more than five hundred years before he came. (Isa. 40:3).

2. His Message (vv. 3-8).

(1) "Prepare the Way of the Lord" (v. 3). This means to remove from your hearts everything which hinders the incoming of the Lord, to break down the high places of pride and to straighten out the crooked places, not only to confess your sins, but to give substantial evidence of repentance.

(2) "Baptism of Repentance for the Remission of Sins" (v. 4). In preparation for the coming of Christ the people were to repent and those who repented were to be baptized. Baptism was administered to those who repented as an expression of the penitence which led to the forgiveness of sin.

(3) The Coming of Christ (vv. 7, 8). This coming was to be much greater than that of John. This superior dignity was not only in His person but in the work He was to perform. John baptized with water, but Jesus was to be the baptizer with the Holy Ghost.

3. His Success (v. 5). People from all over Judea and from Jerusalem went out and were baptized. John's dress and demeanor were in keeping with his stern mission. His food and dress indicated that he had withdrawn from the world as a protest against its follies and sins.

III. The Baptism of the Servant (vv. 9-11).

While the forerunner was discharging his office Jesus emerged from his seclusion at Nazareth and demanded baptism at John's hands.

1. Its Significance.

Negatively. It was not because He had sinned for He was absolutely sinless, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners. This separation was so complete that even the Devil could find no occasion against Him. (John 14:30).

Positively. Its significance is found in harmony with the purpose of His coming into the world, which was to secure for His people salvation through death and resurrection. This act was His official entrance upon His work. It was an act of consecration on his part to the work of saving His people through sacrifice. While baptism is a sinner's ordinance, He was baptized, not because He had sinned, but because He took the place of sinners. He was so devoted to them that He entered upon His mission by submitting to the ordinance which typified death and resurrection. In this He who knew no sin was made sin for us that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him (II Cor. 5:21).

2. Approval From the Open Heavens (vv. 10, 11). Immediately following His consecration to His work the heavens were opened and the Spirit came and abode upon Him, followed by the words of approval from the Father. All these were essential for the work upon which He now entered.

FAVORITE FRUIT DISHES

Food nicely served and daintily garnished will be much more appetizing than that which is served carelessly. Next to the palatability of our food we like to have it appeal to the eye.

A luscious basket of fruit garnished with its own foliage when possible, is an ornament to any table.

For those who cannot eat uncooked apples or pears, try this dainty dish to set before them: Stew the fruit in a rich sirup until tender enough to pierce easily, then decorate with quartered almonds, dust with powdered sugar and pour around them the sirup, put into a hot oven to finish cooking. The almonds will be brown and the fruit of delicious flavor. Serve with the sirup and a little whipped cream. If pears are cooked add a little lemon juice to the sirup. When fresh berries are out of season mold a few preserved strawberries in an orange jelly and serve the quivering mounds with whipped cream and a little of the preserves.

Halves of muskmelons filled with ice cream and garnished with small pieces of preserved ginger to simulate seeds is both palatable and pretty. Roasted almonds also may be used in place of the ginger.

Cored apples filled with a mixture of nuts and marmalade, baked and covered with a meringue, is another apple dish de luxe.

Grated apple added to the white of egg and sugar make a most delicious filling for a plain layer cake.

Grated apple added to the white of egg, beaten stiff with powdered sugar, served in sherbet glasses with a thin custard, makes a most dainty dessert.

Stewed pears, cored and centers filled with jelly, served with whipped cream, is another worthy of trial.

Ripe peaches put through a sieve, added to ice cream ready to be frozen, flavored with almond, is delicious.

Halves of ripe peaches filled with nuts and topped with a spoonful of ice cream is a favorite dessert. Half of a peach placed on a round of sponge cake and both laid upon a slice of brick ice cream is another pleasing fruit dessert.

Hot breads, such as gems, griddle cakes and waffles may occasionally take the place of toast, though the season, temperature and individual has much to do about the food served.

Remove the cake of soap from the pan, pail or tub; do not waste it by leaving it to become soaked.

The art of cooking cannot be learned out of a book any more than the art of swimming or the art of painting. The best teacher is practice; the best guide is sentiment.

MEALS FOR TWO

Where there are but two in the family for which to provide meals unless there are guests there are many things which must be denied them as they represent too much in leftovers. However, there are enough to keep a variety, even for two.

The spring chicken is just about the right size for two when it first comes into the market and chops and small steaks may be bought in any market.

Fish is another dish for the small family, when one may buy a fillet of any of the larger trout or lake fish, and the smaller ones are of suitable size to serve whole.

Vegetables may be cooked and served in any quantity, small or large; omelets are good for the small family; souffles may be prepared in any size and puddings of various kinds and small pies may be prepared.

A larger chicken need not be an extravagance, for it may be served in various ways without becoming monotonous. Use the back with the neck and wing tips for stew with dumplings. Save the breast or part of it for chicken salad, or slice it and serve it cold. The giblets, if cooked slowly covered with cold water, may be chopped and added to the gravy or served in a rich cream sauce on buttered toast.

Part of the chicken after parboiling may be fried, such as the second joints, wings and drumsticks. If the meat seems too scanty add a cupful of fresh cooked mushrooms. These may be found in the fields all summer. All bits left over may be used as minced chicken on toast and the bones and unedible parts will make a nice dish of soup, adding cream and a beaten egg.

Salads are easy to prepare in small quantities and one need never lack for variety.

Brook Trout Baked in Cream.—Butter a baking dish and lay a freshly-caught and well-dressed trout or two in the pan. Cover with sweet cream, adding salt and other seasoning just at the last, as salt often curdles the cream. Serve hot with the cream as sauce.

HUSBAND SAID WHY NOT TRY IT

Wife Said She Would. Result Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Made Her Well and Strong

East Hardwick, Vt.—"Last winter I was not able to do any work at all. I had backache, headache, side ache, and was sick all the time for six months. We read about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in the newspapers, and my husband said to me, 'Why don't you try it?' So I said I would, and he went and got me a dozen bottles. It has done me more good than I can ever tell, and my friends say, 'What have you done to yourself? You look so well.' I tell them it is the Vegetable Compound that makes me so well and strong. There is no use to suffer with backache and pains. I will tell every one what it has done for me."—Mrs. FRED. PRIMO, Route No. 2, East Hardwick, Vermont.

Housewives make a great mistake in allowing themselves to become so ill that it is well-nigh impossible for them to attend to their household duties.

In a recent country-wide canvass of purchasers of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, 98 out of every 100 report they were benefited by its use. For sale by druggists everywhere.

When Century Begins

The year 1900 was the last year of the Nineteenth century. Theoretically the Christian era began with the birth of Christ. Since a century is 100 years the first century of our era must have ended with the year 100 A. D. Therefore the second century began with the first day in 101. The first century consisted of the years 1 to 100 inclusive. We are now living in the 24th year of the Twentieth century which began January 1, 1901.

Looking Years Ahead
To Be Ready to Serve

THE enormous additions to be made to the telephone system this year must be made to fit the plans of the future.

To do this economically and make the additions of the greatest service value, the engineers have already planned the work for a period of five years in the future.

Gross additions to the telephone plant of this Company, costing not less than $37,700,000 will be required during the next five years.

During this period it is estimated that there will be a net gain of 127,000 new telephones.

The money for this undertaking must be secured from investors who are willing to put their money in the telephone business in the South. They will not supply it unless they are assured of an annual net return which they consider reasonable.

Your state's share and your city's share in this rapid expansion of the telephone system is of great importance. A proper understanding of our problems and friendly co-operation on your part are necessary to the successful accomplishment of such a gigantic task.

Government Report Sends Cotton Up

The price of cotton jumped $16 a bale Monday on the government report issued for July 16 showing a condition at that date of 68.5 as compared with a previous report af June 25, which showed the condition to be at that date 71 per cent. The forecast for Alabama indicates a crop of 880,000 bales, the largest in the state since 1915.

PLANS SUBMITTED FOR WATER WORKS

Following a recent survey of the town by the J. B. McCrary Engineering company of Atlanta, that company has submitted to the town council of Columbiana plans and estimates for a system of water works.

The survey shows two pipe line plans with two locations of a deep well, the well being the anticipated source of water supply.

In the one plan the well would be located on the School House lot with two lines of 6-inch pipe leading into the business part of town The estimate for this plan includes 400-foot well with equipment, steel tank and pipe line at a cost of $29,902.75.

In the other plan the well would be located near the Court House square which would cut down the amount of cast iron pipe; and the estimate for this plan is $22,433.19

SHELBY PASTURES SHOWING UP WELL

After seeing the pastures on the farms of J. M. Frost and E. C. Burton, planted last spring under the direction of County Agent A. A. Lauderdale, John Rigdon, pasture specialist in the agricultural service of the Central of Georgia Railroad, said it would no longer be necessary for Shelby county farmers to go to the McElderry Farms in Talladega county to see a real pasture.

Mr. Frost and Mr. Burton planted a combination of carpet grass, Dallis grass, and lespedeza, which is recommended by Mr. Rigdon out of his experience of a number of years, and they both have fine stands of grass. Mr. Frost has been dairying for a number of years and already had a good pasture, but he helieves this new combination of grasses will be an improvement over anything he has had.

It is Mr. Laudtrdale's plan to get Mr. Rigdon to come back to Shelby county at a later date and hold other meetings so that still more farmers may hear him tell of the part that better pastures will play in bringing in better farming conditions.

M., Mrs. Bessie Roper; Sec., Mrs. Ida M. Sharp; Treas., Mrs. Pearle Morrison; Cond., Mrs. Nannie Dement; A. Cond., Mrs. Esther Hunter.

The appointive officers are: Chaplain, Mrs. Teria Kellum; Mrs. shail, Mrs. Nora Hammett; Ada.., Mrs. Rhoda Lynes; Ruth, Mrs. Myrtle Terrell: Martha, Mrs. Ellen Durham; Electa, Mrs. Ella Mullins; Warder, Mrs. Sarah Peter- Sentined, W. E. Lively; Esther Mrs. Lois Lively.

Mrs. Alice White of Boston Chapter, a former Grand Marshall assisted Mrs. Kellum in the installation of the new officers. Miss Myrtle Fason of Woodlawn 110, was a visitor at this meeting. A spirit of unusual enthusiasm seems to prevail, and prospects are bright for the coming year.

Leaders of the Republican party announce that they will conduct a nation-wide, rather than a sectional, campaign this year.

Congressman Almon predicts that the Ford offer for Muscle Shoals will be accepted by Congress in Dececber.

A contract has been let for the construction of the Erskine Ramsey Engineering hall at Auburn at a cost of over $200,000.

PLANS BEING MADE FOR NEW SCHOOL AT WILSONVILLE

The people of Wilsonville are genuinely interested in a plan to establish a consolidated school. They came together Friday night of last week and discussed the proposition from every angle and voted unanimously to do their best to carry the project through. Not a one present expressed any opposition to the movement and several talks were made emphasizing the advantages to the community of such a school as they propose to build. Some of those present had taken opportunity to discuss the plan with a number of citizens of the adjacent districts which it is planned will be brought into the consolidation, and they stated that so far not a man had been found who did not approve the movement heartily.

A committee made up of W. H. Pope, W. E. Riddle, C. M. Mauldin was appointed to secure more definite information as to certain phases of the movement and to work out the plans for carrying the movement on. It is expected that another meeting will be called soon to which every citizen of the proposed enlarged district will be invited with a speaker from the state department of education who can answer every question as to the details of future plans.

Jones Auto Company Finds Business Good

Two tractors and two saw mills sold within an hour's time, make up a good day's business and that was the record of the E. M. Jones Auto Company of Columbiana on Monday of this week. The purchasers were T. B. Holcombe, Rt. 2, Columbiana and B. M. Turner of Chelsea.

Mr. Jones states that his sales of cars, trucks and tractors to date for 1924 are exactly equal to the whole number sold last year, last year being his first in business; and he has every reason now, he says, to believe that the total sales for this year will run at least twenty five per cent above the allotment made to him by the Ford Motor Company at the beginning of the year.

Mr. Jones left Monday night, accompanied by H. R. Cox, for Memphis, Tenn., where they will complete plans for establishing a New Ford Agency at Courtland, Alabama, which will be a branch of the E. M. Jones Auto Company of Columbiana, and will be under the management of Mr. Cox.

Talladega Builds More New School Houses

Talladega county continues to build new school houses. Last week the state department of education accepted a new building at Lanier that cost $7,500. The Ida Academy, a new six room brick building that cost $12,000, will soon be ready to be passed by the state department. Both of the new schools are located in strictly rural communities.

CLEAN-UP CAMPAIGN GETS BIG RESULTS

"Not since the Lord knows when," as one citizen put it, has Columbiana had such a clean-up as was given the old town last week. Following the adoption of the Trash Ordinance, City Marshal Miller with a crew of men and two wagons set to work under instructions of the Town Council. They started back of the stores, then came out into Main street and then went into the residence section. Dozens of loads of trash of all sorts and kinds were raked up and hauled away.

On Friday the Exchange Club joined in the movement and a crew of men, made up of the members of the club and of men hired by other members who could not come themselves, worked all day under the direction of Harry Gordon, chairman of the committee that had the work in charge. E. M. Jones furnished two trucks that went all day, and truck load after truck load of trash, much of which looked as if it had lain undisturbed for years, was raked up and carted away.

As a result the business section of the town looks cleaner and better than for a long time. The same is true of some parts of the residence section. But the job is not yet finished and it is expected that plans will be worked out soon for carrying on the good work that has been started until the whole town shall present a clean and attractive appearance.

Shelby county has a new rural mail route. Service was started on Route One from Chelsea on July 16. In addition to serving a large number of patrons who have not had mail delivery a number of patrons of Route 3, from Columbiana, those living beyond the mountain, are being served by the new route.

BOB MERRELL SENT TO JAIL WITHOUT BOND

R. L. Merrell of Calera, charged with the killing of N. F. McElroy on the night of June 28th, was denied bond and returned to jail, as a result of the preliminary hearing before Judge Leonard Friday. Reggie Lucas, held on a similar charge, was given bond in the sum of $1,000 after which he was released from jail.

The trials attracted the largest crowd that has been seen in the Shelby county court room in a long time. Beginning at ten o'clock in the morning, they continued through several hours in the afternoon. The principal witness in the Merrell case was Reggie Lucas who testified that McElroy, Merrell and he were together in the woods on the night of the killing, having gone there to get some whiskey, and that he, while walking in front of the other two heard two pistol shots and upon looking around saw Merrell with a pistol in his hand. Lucas stated further that he ran off after hearing the pistol shots and did not again see McElroy.

Lucas stated further that he saw Merrell twice after the killing and that each time Merrell warned him not to tell and that later Merrell came to see him in Powderly and asked him to come and help move the body, suggesting that it could be put into an old house and burned.

A great deal of credit for so promptly clearing up what promised to be one of the greatest murder mysteries Shelby county has ever known is given to Thos. P. Williamson of the State Law Enforcement department, who was detailed by Chief Walter McAdory for the case. Coming to Calera to begin work on Thursday morning he had scarcely a clue with which to start. By the following Tuesday night he had completed his case, having arrested two men and having secured from one of them a confession that so deeply involved the other as to cause the court to refuse him bail.

It was Mr. Williamson who assisted Sheriff Falkner in working up the case of George Robinson who killed Wm. Murphy near Columbiana about a year ago. Robinson was arrested on the day following the crime, given a prompt trial, sentenced and hanged.

H. L. Walton Gets Good Promotion

The following complimentary mention of an old Shelby county boy who is making good, appeared recently in the "Passing Throng" Column of the Montgomery Advertiser:

Insurance companies are good judges of men. You can look around you every day and become convinced of the fact that when it comes to picking "live ones" youv'e got to hand the obsolete demijohn to the men who run the insurance companies. And here is direct proof that what has been said is so. H. L. Walton has been promoted by the Independent Life Insurance Co. of Nashville to the position of manager of the Montgomery district.

Mr. Walton's friends have always known him to be a hustler. They knew his time was coming and it "has come." Mr. Walton is a native Alabamian. He has been a a resident of Montgomery for six years. He has made hundreds of friends in the city of his adoption and they will be glad to know that his merit has been rewarded.

Mr. Walton is the son of our neighbor, T. A. Walton, Route 1, Columbiana.

The members of the missionary society of the Methodist church of Columbiana enjoyed a delightful picnic at Shelby Springs Tuesday afternoon.

BROWN BROTHERS WILL OPEN WHOLESALE GAS AND OIL BUSINESS

Secure Good Location and Equipment Will Be Installed at Once

Columbiana will have soon a wholesale distributing station for gasoline, kerosene and oils to be established by the Brown Brothers Manufacturing Company of Montevallo. The arrangements for this new business were completed Monday when J. A. Brown, president of the company bought from J. H. Barnett a large lot where the L. & N. railroad crosses the street leading to the Southern station, as a location for the tanks, and Mr. Brown went to Birmingham Tuesday to place an order for the tanks to be shipped out immediately. Just as soon as the new equipment is received the work of installing will be begun and rushed to completion.

Brown Brothers handle the products of the Empire Company, an independent concern with headquarters in Tulsa, Okla. They have been distributing these products for some time from their Montevallo station and have found them giving entire satisfaction to an ever growing patronage. They anticipate the same experience in serving the trade in the Columbiana territory.

The Brown Brothers Manufacturing company has been located in Montevallo a number of years and its members have proved themselves among the greatest builders that live community has had. In addition to their distributing station for oils and gas they operate an ice plant, turning out a product that ranks with the best produced anywhere in the state, a large ginnery, a number of saw mills and a big wholesale lumber buisness. It was they who installed an electric light plant for Montevallo, the first the town had, and they operated it successfully for a number of years before selling out to the Alabama Power Company.

Columbiana is fortunate to have Brown Brothers extend their interests here and will heartily welcome them to a part in the work already underway of building a bigger and a better community.

Mrs. Mary M. Babb

Montevallo, Alabama, July 21.—News has just reached Montevallo that Mrs. Mary Morrison Babb, aged 75, died at Kossuth, Miss., on July 18. She was elected to membership in Alabama College faculty at the beginning of the first session in 1896, and served continously until 1907 when she voluntarily resigned.

She was the widow of James Babb, who lived only six weeks after their marriage. He has been dead 50 years. During this time, she has devoted her life principally to teaching. Besides her long career at Montevallo, she has taught at Corinth, Miss., Memphis Conference Female Institute, and Saule College, Murfeesboro, Tenn., and other placese.

She was a woman of high culture, rare intelligence, and superior ability as a teacher. She was a student of human nature and possessed tactfulness not often found. She left an impression the lives of innumerable young people who came under her tutelage At Montevallo she was universally popular with the faculty and students, during the first eleven years of Alabama College, then known as the Girls Industrial School.

T. Ray Seriously Hurt

T. Ray of Wilder's Hill community was seriously hurt in an accident near his home Saturday. Mr. Ray was helping to move a house and was sitting on the end of a prize pole when the jack slipped causing the house to fall. Latest reports indicate that his injuries were not so serious and that he will recover.

GOV. BRANDON ASKS FOR PORT RULING

SUPREME COURT JUDGES CALLED UPON TO CLARIFY PROVISONS OF SEC. 213, AS TO TWO-THIRDS RULE

Montgomery.—Governor Brandon has formally certified to the members of the supreme court a request for an advisory opinion on the restrictions imposed on the issuance of port improvement bonds by section 213 of the constitution of Alabama. The members will render the opinion under a law which grants this authority without making the opinion binding on any future decision of the court.

Section 213 of the constitution requires a two-thirds vote of the members of both houses of the legislature before any debt can be created. The port improvement amendment to the constitution ratified two years ago authorized the state to spend ten million dollars in constructing facilities at the seaport and an enabling act passed last year granted authority to the state to issue bonds totalling ten million dollars for the work.

The contention of some is that there should have been a two-thirds majority of all members elected to the two houses in order to make the enabling act valid. Two-thirds of the members present voted for the bill, but two-thirds of all members of the two houses were not present at the time the vote was taken.

A survey of Alabamas' three higher institutions of learning to ascertain their needs, and adequate appropriations to meet these needs, were advocated by Judge W. H. Samford of the court of appeals, president of the Auburn Alumni association, in an address at a recent alumni meeting. He recommended the appointment of a commission by the boards of trustees of Auburn, Alabama college and the University of Alabama, at the call of the governor to make the survey.

Another application of the one mill school tax on all property in Madison county for the purpose of adding to the school funds was recommended at a meeting of trustees and county board of education in the Kiwanis club. Superintendent Butler showed that the funds for schools available now are not quite sufficient and that the reapplication of the one mill tax would furnish enough money to add an additional month to the school term.

The social service workers of Jasper have united in an effort to take care of the needy in that town. At a meeting in the Methodist church building the community chest organization was perfected and working committees were appointed to carry on the work. The county commissioners are discussing the advisability of appointing a county probation officer and the community chest has appointed a committee to confer with the commission in reference to the matter.

Investigations have been made by the state mining inspectors into the death of Robert Stewart, pumper employed by the Republic Iron & Steel company, who met death by a gas explosion in the Palos mines. Stewart went into the mines at 8 o'clock of the morning of the fatal day, it was learned and evidently his open lamp came in contact with a little pocket of gas and he was killed in the explosion. His body was taken out during the afternoon. He leaves a family.

Contracts have been awarded to the Crow Construction company by Charles W. Negley for the reconstruction of the Jefferson hotel in Florence, which was destroyed by fire sometime ago. The donkey will be placed in the department of archives and history, Governor Brandon stated. The gift resulted from the resounding manner in which Governor Brandon cast Alabama's 24 votes for Underwood at the demoratic convention, which won the admiration of radio fans over the country.

Claiming to have been tortured for 22 years with the memory of a slaying Oliver Cameron, now 51 years of age, former resident of Jefferson County, tried to drown himself in the Williamette River, near Portland, Ore., recently, and was rescued by police to whom he told a tale of killing, during a quarrel, one U. J. Gay, near Birmingham, in 1902, according to a dispatch.

Considerable development of iron ore properties along the Tennessee, Alabama and Georgia railroad is being planned. The mines at Estelle have already resumed operations and are now shipping five cars daily to the Holt furnace. The Bronco mines will soon be producing 50 cars a week, the output to go to furnaces in Tennessee. It is said mines at Cipco and other places along the line are to resume when the iron market improves.

Miss Virginia B. Handley, director of the state child welfare department, has written employers of child labor over the state, calling attention to amendments to the child labor law, enacted in 1923. The amendments include the raising of the educational requirements necessary for an employment certificate to the fifth grade, effective September 1, 1924.

Asserting that the undertaker who buried her husband put his body in a coffin too small for it and nailed the deceased feet to the bottom, thereby disfiguring his body and transforming it into a gruesome sight, Leona Lawrence filed suit in the Jefferson County circuit court recently against the E. A. Bradford Undertaking Company for $20,000 damages.

A bond issue totaling $485,000 will be voted on by the electors of the city of Mobile September 8 under terms of an ordinance prepared by the city attorney, Frank Yerger, and presented to the commission. The bonds will go for improvements of the city hospital city docks, fire alarm and police alarm systems and a centralized fire department.

Exquisite Boudoir Apparel; Simply Trimmed and Beltless

WHAT an exquisite role color is playing throughout the galaxy of beautiful boudoir apparel which lures womankind to spend and spend and then long for more to spend.

A strictly conservative order of dress maintained in the away-from-home daytime hours is almost a sure sign when it comes to one's boudoir apparel to result in a complete reaction toward the most frivolous and loveliest of garments one's imagination may picture.

Charming Boudoir Costume.

This is as it should be, according to the psychologists, who tell us that the clothes we wear have much to do with our poise and well-being. Lace, color and sheer caressing silken fabric—what power there is in this trio of loveliness to quiet "nerves" and coax serenity of mind.

An unfailing antidote to one's vexation of spirit is a beauteous chiffon robe of filmy georgette, orchid the shade, or peach pink, if you prefer, plaited for the underslip as the picture shows, veiled with a slipover of lace and chiffon, which is nothing more nor less than a circle with an opening in the center. The lace alternates with rows of fine net puffing, and a chiffon tie confines this Greek-like drapery to the form.

Rainbow treatment imparts fascination to many a fashionable negligee. Rose over yellow over orchid—thus does diaphanous chiffon produce a color symphony.

Summer breakfast coats choose satin-back crepe for their making in such delectable shades as coral, lavished with rows and motifs of ochre-tinted lace, white crepe edged with plaitings of val edging which are dyed in several of the popular pastel tones.

As spontaneous and as unaffected as childhood itself are the frocks designed for wee daughter this season. The beltless mode accents childish grace and it is this type which fashion favors most for little girls. Simplicity is also emphasized throughout all trimming and this also lends fascination to youthful summer models.

It is a pleasing sight to see, at summertime juvenile gatherings, little girls of airy-fairy grace flitting about in quaintly beruffled frocks of dotted swiss or pastel-tinted voile, which fall straight from the shoulder in unbroken line. Dotted red swiss is a favorite material for children's costumes this summer. In fact red and white in combination lead in color schemes.

Very charming, and preserving the beltless contour, is a dainty model fashioned of daffodil yellow swiss with white pin dots. It has a round yoke, and, by the way, many of the beltless dresses boast yokes either square or round. The unique detail in the above mentioned yellow swiss frock is the method of applying vertical rows of white footing, beginning at the yoke-line and extending to the hem.

It is a very practical idea to include at least one dark silk or crepe dress in little daughter's vacation-time wardrobe. The model in the picture is suggested as being a valuable acquisition, possessing as it does, style, charm and practicality. It is of navy crepe-satin, the crepe side used for the body, the satin for the ruffles. The ribbon tie with streamers extending to the bottom of the dress is picoted with red

Lesson for July 27

THE TEMPTATION OF JESUS

LESSON TEXT—Matt. 4:1-11.

GOLDEN TEXT—"For in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted."—Heb. 2:18.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Refuses to Do Wrong.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Conquers the Tempter.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Jesus Shows Us How to Overcome Temptation.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Victory Over the Tempter.

I. Its Purpose (v. 1).

The Holy Spirit led Him into the wilderness with the specific purpose that He there meet and overcome the one whose works He came to destroy (Heb. 2:14). His temptation was not a preparation for His work, as usually thought, but rather the opening of the dreadful conflict between Christ and Satan, which was to issue in Satan's defeat. It was not to test Jesus to find out as to whether He would stand fast—to see whether He would sin. The eternal purpose of God as to redemption absolutely could not fail. It was rather to exhibit Him as an object upon which faith might rest, to show that a union between God and man had been effected which would insure man's reconciliation.

II. The Conflict (vv. 2-11).

1. The Combatants (v. 1).

(1) Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ, the Divine Man, is now entering upon His mediatorial work. He went immediately from the place of anointing and heavenly recognition as the Son of God to meet the arch-enemy of the race.

(2) The Devil. He was a real person and, while always filled with cunning and malice, in this case the initiative was taken by the Lord. He was dragged into the presence of Jesus Christ and forced into the struggle.

2. The Battle Ground (v. 1). It was in the wilderness of Judea. The first man was tempted in a garden with the most pleasant surroundings and failed. The second man was tempted in a barren wilderness, surrounded by wild beasts, and gloriously triumphed.

3. The Method of Attack (vv. 2-10). Since as our Redeemer Christ sustained a threefold relationship, the Son of Man, Son of God and as Messiah, each one was made a ground of attack.

(1) As Son of Man (vv. 2, 3). This was a test of the reality of His humanity. To demonstrate whether the humanity which He obtained through the virgin birth was real, the appeal was made to the instinct of hunger. Hunger is not the result of sin. While the appetite is not sinful, to have satisfied it in a wrong way would have been sin.

(2) Son of God (vv. 5, 6). This was a test as to whether the personality which had come from heaven and taken upon itself humanity was divine. The Devil quoted from a Messianic psalm to get Him to presume upon God's care. God does care for His own, but to neglect common precaution—to do the uncalled for thing—just to put God's promise to a test is sin and death. Satan tempts men today to do the spectacular things in order to get publicity, to gain the ears of the people.

(3) As Messiah (vv. 8, 9). Christ's mission as the Messiah was to recover this world from the Devil. The Devil offered to surrender to Him on the simple condition that He would adopt his method, thus obviating the necessity of the cross. The kingdoms were really Christ's and He knew that they would ultimately become His. The inducement was to get immediate possession without the sufferings of the cross.

4. The Defense (vv. 4, 7, 10). Christ met the enemy each time and repulsed his attack with the Word of God. Each time He said, "It is written" and quoted from Deuteronomy, the book which the higher critics would discredit. Christ had enough confidence in it to use it in this, the most crucial, hour of the world's history.

5. The Issue (v. 11).

(1) Satan vanquished. The enemy was completely routed. The strong man was so bound that the spoiling of his house was possible.

(2) Angels came and ministered unto Him. This event was so notable that these glorious beings were sent from heaven to give it recognition and to minister unto the triumphant King.

Man's Sorrows

Man's sorrows are a mystery, but that sinners should not have sorrows were a sadder mystery still. And God pleads with us all not to lose the good of our experiences of the bitterness of sin by our levity or our blindness to their meanings.—Alexander Maclaren.

A Prayer

We pray Thee, O God, that Thou wilt help us to be faithful, earnest and true in all of our work, whatever it may be.

Clear Conscience

Lots of people regard a clear conscience as more of a luxury than a necessity.

Considering Others

It is always easier to discuss the duties of others, than to do our own.

"Thanks," said Transley. "That's what I wanted to know."

CHAPTER II

Transley and Linder were so early about next morning after their conversation with Y.D. that there was no opportunity of another meeting with the rancher's wife or daughter. They were slipping quietly out of the house to take breakfast with the men when Y.D. intercepted them.

"Breakfast is waitin', boys," he said, and led them back into the room where they had had supper the previous evening. Y.D. ate with them, but the meal was served by the Chinese boy.

In the yard all was jingling excitement. The men of the Y.D. were fraternally assisting Transley's gang in hitching up and getting away, and there was much bustling activity to an accompaniment of friendly profanity. It was not yet six o'clock, but the sun was well up over the eastern ridges that fringed the valley, and to the west the snow-capped summits of the mountains shone like polished ivory. The exhilaration in the air was almost intoxicating.

Linder quickly converted the apparent chaos of horses, wagons and implements into order; Transley had a last word with Y.D., and the rancher, shouting "Good luck, boys! Make it a thousand tons or more," waved them away.

Linder glanced back at the house. The bright sunshine had not awakened it; it lay dreaming in its grove of cool, green trees.

The trail lay, not up the valley, but across the wedge of foothills which divided the South Y.D. from the parent stream. The ascent was therefore much more rapid than the trails which followed the general course of the stream. Huge hills, shouldering together, left at times only wagon-track room between; at other places they skirted dangerous cutbanks worn by spring freshets, and again trekked for long distances over gently curving uplands. In an hour the horses were showing the strain of it, and Linder halted them for a momentary rest.

It was at that moment that Drazk rode up, his face a study in obvious annoyance.

"Danged if I ain't left that Pete-horse's blanket down at the Y.D.," he exclaimed.

"Oh, well, you can easily ride back for it and catch up on us this afternoon," said Linder, who was not in the least deceived.

"Thanks, Lin," said Drazk. I'll beat it down an' catch up on you this afternoon, sure," and he was off down the trail as fast as "that Pete-horse" could carry him.

At the Y.D. George conducted the search for his horse blanket in the strangest places. It took him mainly about the yard of the house, and even to the kitchen door, where he interviewed the Chinese boy.

"You catchee horse blanket around here?" he inquired, with appropriate gesticulations.

"You losee hoss blanket?"

"Yep."

"What kind hoss blanket?"

"Jus' a brown blanket for that Pete-horse."

"Whose hoss?"

"Mine," proudly.

"Where you catchee?"

"Raised him."

"Good hoss?"

"You betcha."

"Huh!"

Pause.

"You no catchee horse blanket, hey?"

"No!" said the Chinaman, whose manner instantly changed. In this brief conversation he had classified Drazk, and classified him correctly. "You catchee him, though—some h—l, too—you stickee lound here. Beat it," and Drazk found the kitchen door closed in his face.

Drazk wandered slowly around the side of the house, and was not above a surreptitious glance through the windows. They revealed nothing. He followed a path out by a little gate. His ruse had proven a blind trail, and there was nothing to do but go down to the stables, take the horse blanket from the pe where he had hung it, and set out again for the South Y.D.

As he turned a corner of the fence the sight of a young woman burst upon him. She was hatless and facing the sun. Drazk, for all his admiration of the sex, had little eye for detail. "A sort of chestnut, about sixteen hands high, and with the look of a thoroughbred," he afterwards described her to Linder.

She turned at the sound of his footsteps, and Drazk instantly summoned a smirk which set his homely face a beaming with good humor.

"Pardon me, ma'am," he said, with an elaborate bow. "I am Mr. Drazk—Mr. George Drazk—Mr. Transley's assistant. No doubt he spoke of me."

She was inside the inclosure formed by the fence, and he outside. She turned on him eyes which set Drazk's pulses strangely a-tingle, and subjected him to a deliberate but not unfriendly inspection.

"No, I don't believe he did," she said at length.

Drazk cautiously approached, as though wondering how near he could come without frightening her away. He reached the fence and leaned his elbows on it. She showed no disposition to move. He cautiously raised one foot and rested it on the lower rail.

"It's a fine morning, ma'am," he ventured.

"Rather," she replied. "Why aren't you with Mr. Transley's gang?"

The question gave George an opening. "Well, you see," he said, "it's all on account of that Pete-horse. That's him down there. I rode away this morning and plumb forgot his blanket. So when Mr. Transley seen it he says, 'Drazk, take the day off an' go back for your blanket,' he says. 'There's no hurry,' he says. 'Linder an' me 'll manage,' he says."

"Oh!"

"So here I am." He glanced at her again. She was showing no disposition to run away. She was about two yards from him, along the fence. Drazk wondered how long it would take him to bridge that distance. Even as he looked she leaned her elbows on the fence and rested one of her feet on the lower rail. Drazk fancied he saw the muscles about her mouth pulling her face into little, laughing curves, but she was gazing soberly into the distance.

"He's some horse, that Pete-horse," he said, taking up the subject which lay most ready to his tongue. "He's sure some horse."

"I have no doubt."

"Yep," Drazk continued. "Him an' me has seen some times. Whew! Things I couldn't tell you about, at all."

"Well, aren't you going to?"

Drazk glanced at her curiously. This girl showed signs of leading him out of his depth. But it was a very delightful sensation to feel one's self being led out of his depth by such a girl. Her face was motionless; her eyes fixed dreamily upon the brown prairies that swept up the flanks of the foothills to the south. Far and away on their curving crests the dark snake-line of Transley's outfit could be seen apparently motionless on the rim of the horizon.

Drazk changed his foot on the rail and the motion brought him six inches nearer her.

"Well, f'r instance," he said, spurring his imagination into action, "there was the fellow I run down an' shot in the Cypress Hills."

"Shot!" she exclaimed, and the note of admiration in her voice stirred him to further flights.

"Yep," he continued, proudly. "Shot an' buried him there, right by the road where he fell. Only me an' that Pete-horse knows the spot."

George sighed sentimentally. "It's awful sad, havin' to kill a man," he went on, "an' it makes you feel strange an' creepy, 'specially at nights. That is, the first one affects you that way, but you soon get used to it. You see, he insulted—"

"The first one? Have you killed more than one?"

"Oh yes, lots of them. A man like me, what knocks around all over with all sorts of people, has to do it.

"Then there's the police. After you kill a few men nat'rally the police begins to worry you. I always hate to kill a policeman."

"It must be an interesting life."

"It is, but it's a hard one," he said, after a pause during which he had changed feet again and taken up another six inches of the distance which separated them. He was almost afraid to continue the conversation. He was finding progress so much easier than he had expected. It was evident that he had made a tremendous hit with Y.D.'s daughter. What a story to tell Linder! What would Transley say? He was shaking with excitement.

"It's an awful hard life," he went on, "an' there comes a time, miss, when a man wants to quit it. There comes a time when every decent man wants to settle down. I been thinkin' about that a lot lately. . . . What do you think about it?" Drazk had gone white. He felt that he actually had proposed to her.

"Might be a good idea," she replied, demurely.

He changed feet again. He had gone too far to stop. He must strike the iron when it was hot. Of course he had no desire to stop, but it was all so wonderful. He could speak to her now in a whisper.

"How about you, miss? How about you an' me jus' settlin' down?"

She did not answer for a moment. Then, in a low voice:

"It wouldn't be fair to accept you like this, Mr. Drazk. You don't know anything about me."

"An' I don't want to—I mean, I don't care what about you."

"But it wouldn't be fair until you know," she continued. "There are things I'd have to tell you, and I don't like to."

She was looking downward now, and he fancied he could see the color rising about her cheeks and her frame trembling. He turned toward her and extended his arms. "Tell me—tell your own George," he cooed.

"No," she said, with sudden rigidity. "I can't confess."

"Come on," he pleaded. "Tell me. I've been a bad man, too."

She seemed to be weighing the matter. "If I tell you, you will never, never mention it to anyone?"

"Never. I swear it to you," dramatically raising his hand.

"Well," she said, looking down bashfully and making little marks with her finger-nail in the pole on which they were leaning, "I never told anyone before, and nobody in the world knows it except he and me, and he doesn't know it now either, because I killed him. . . . I had to do it."

"Of course you did, dear," he murmured. It was wonderful to receive a woman's confidence like this.

"Yes, I had to kill him," she repeated. "You see, he—he proposed to me without being introduced!"

It was some seconds before Drazk felt the blow. It came to him gradually, like returning consciousness to a man who has been stunned. Then anger swept him.

"You're playin' with me," he cried. "You're makin' a fool of me!"

"Oh, George dear, how could I?" she protested. "Now perhaps you better run along to that Pete-horse. He looks lonely."

"All right," he said, striding away angrily. As he walked his rage deepened, and he turned and shook his fist at her, shouting, "All right, but I'll get you yet, see? You think you're smart, and Transley thinks he's smart, but George Drazk is smarter than both of you, and he'll get you yet."

She waved her hand complacently but her composure had already maddened him. He jerked his horse up roughly, threw himself into the saddle, and set out at a hard gallop along the trail to the South Y.D.

It was mid-afternoon when he overtook Transley's outfit, now winding down the southern slope of the tongue of foothills which divided the two valleys of the Y.D. Pete, wet over the flanks, pulled up of his own accord beside Linder's wagon.

"'Lo, George," said Linder. "What's your hurry?" Then, glancing at his saddle, "Where's your blanket?"

Drazk's jaw dropped, but he had a quick wit, although an unbalanced one.

"Well, Lin, I clean forgot all about it," he admitted, with a laugh, "but when a fellow spends the morning chatting with old Y.D.'s daughter I guess he's allowed to forget a few things."

"Oh!"

"Reckon you don't believe it, eh, Lin? Reckon you don't believe I stood an' talked for so long I just had to pull myself away?"

"You reckon right."

George was thinking fast. Here was an opportunity to present the incident in a light which had not before occurred to him.

"Guess you wouldn't believe she told me her secret—told me somethin' she had never told anybody else, an' made me swear not to mention. Guess you don't believe that, neither?"

"You guess right again." Linder was quite unperturbed. He knew something of Drazk's gift for romancing.

Drazk leaned over in the saddle until he could reach Linder's ear with a loud whisper. "And she called me 'dear'; 'George dear,' she said, when I came away."

"The h—l she did!" said Linder, at last prodded into interest. He considered the "George dear" idea a daring flight, even for Drazk. "Better not let old Y.D. hear you spinning anything like that, George, or he'll be likely to spoil your youthful beauty."

"Oh, Y.D.'s all right," said George, knowingly. "Y.D.'s all right. Well, I guess I'll let Pete feed a bit here, and then we'll go back for his blanket. You'll have to excuse me a bit these days, Lin; you know how it is when a fellow's in love."

"Huh!" said Linder.

Suppose Transley starts in to cut hay and is warned off by Landson, who is already at work. What do you imagine will happen?

Plain of Jordan

Canals to irrigate the plain of Jordan, round the Dead sea, are proposed; wide areas covered with fertile soil could then be cultivated.

DAIRY THE

SOY BEAN SUPERIOR FOR DAIRY CATTLE

One of the best home-grown feeds that can be grown anywhere is soy beans, a crop that should be known on every dairy farm. The soy bean may be combined advantageously in many systems of crop rotations. It is especially adapted to short rotations that take either an entire season or a part of a season following some grain crop. In the Southern states the crop is adapted to practically the same places as cowpeas, says W. J. Keegan, dairy husbandman at Clemson college, who believes that soy beans should have a prominent place on every dairy farm in the state.

The feeding value of soy-bean seed, which contain from 30 to 46 per cent protein, is very high and compares favorably with other concentrated feeds. The growing of soy-bean seed will enable the dairy farmer to produce at a moderate cost at least part of the high protein concentrates necessary for milk production. Soy-bean seed contain a higher percentage of digestible nutrients than cottonseed meal, linseed meal or wheat bran.

Soy-bean seed ground into meal has been found a most excellent feed for dairy cows. The Massachusetts agricultural experiment station compared soy-bean meal and cottonseed meal, using the same ration otherwise. The quantity of milk produced from the soy-bean ration was slightly higher. At the Tennessee station in a similar comparison of the two feeds, the yields both of milk and butterfat were about 5 per cent greater for the soy-bean meal.

In the South, as a feed for dairy cows, perhaps soy beans in hay form is the most valuable. As compared with hay from other leguminous crops, soy-bean hay is equal or superior to any, not excluding alfalfa. Soy-bean hay can be much more readily and easily cured than cowpea hay. The chief value of soy-bean hay lies in its high content of digestible protein. In feeding value it is superior to red clover or cowpeas, and as indicated by comparative feeding tests, is equal to alfalfa for milk production.

Spring Freshened Cows Are Not Meeting Favor

Custom says, "Freshen your cows in the spring." Her arguments are: Feed is cheap in the spring; cows will go out on luxuriant pastures, take care of themselves, produce a lot of milk and all their owners need to do is to milk them and make money.

Custom argues that it costs too much to feed cows and raise calves during the winter months, and that expensively equipped barns, ventilating systems, etc., are necessary where winter dairying is followed.

These are all the arguments custom advances and she refuses to listen to the many objections to spring and summer dairying, a few of which are as follows:

Although it is true that it is much cheaper to produce milk in April, May and June, so is it true that the price secured for milk in those months is extremely low—not once in a while, but always.

Spring-freshened cows have only three good months to work.

July and August bring droughts, dry pastures, heat, flies and busy harvest. If there are any worse factors for turning cows dry, they are not readily apparent. These factors do turn cows dry, rob them of flesh and condition and they are largely accountable for the very low average production of milk.

Spring-freshened cows are dry when fall comes along with high prices for milk and its products, or they are so nearly dry that all that can be afforded is just to winter them as cheaply as possible and look forward to spring freshening when they will again give a lot of milk for three months when milk is cheapest.

Dairy Hints

Provide covered salt boxes in the shade and easily accessible.

To prevent being overrun with flies, clean the premises daily in summer if possible.

Select now dairy animals to be shown at fairs next fall and begin fitting them.

The young spring calves should be placed in lots or pastures which have abundant shade and clean fresh water. They should also be provided with salt the same as the milking herd.

"Hard times" is a meaningless phrase to farmers who keep cows, sows, and hens and a good garden.

Consumption of dairy products in this country has increased 17 per cent in the last seven years.

Kindness may be sentiment, but it pays in handling cows. It may not cause them to produce more abundantly but it surely makes the job of getting what they do yield more pleasant.

REMARKABLE RECOVERY OF MRS. SPINK

Gives Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Full Credit

Minn. Junc., Wis.—"I was under treatment, but nothing seemed to help me, and I was run-down and so weak that I had to remain in bed much of the time and was like an invalid. I had pains in my abdomen and in the female organs, and my stomach bothered me. My husband saw Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound advertised, thought it must be good, and brought it home to me and advised me to try it. After taking one bottle I was able to eat, and after six bottles I was doing my own work, which I hadn't been able to do for years. I have a new baby who is doing nicely, and I am still taking the Vegetable Compound and feeling better than I have for four years. The medicine is surely wonderful and a good thing to have in the house."—Mrs. GEORGE SPINK, Minnesota Junction, Wisconsin.

SUBSCRIPTION, the year $1.50

Entered at the Columbiana, Ala., Postoffice as second class mail, under act of Congress of March, 3rd, 1879.

What Does Shelby County Need Most?—

What does Shelby county need most? Let every one who reads this paper begin to think of that question as never before. The Reporter will be glad to hear from good citizens everywhere who will give thought to this question and publish their answers to this question.

What are some of the things Shelby county needs most? Here is a part of the Reporter's answer, right now:

Consolidated Schools.

A County-wide Organization of Sunday school workers.

An All-Time County Health Officer.

A better organized and more active Farm Bureau.

A Home Demonstration Agent.

Keep Our Town Clean.—

Let every good citizen of Columbiana give whole hearted cooperation to the Town Council in its efforts to keep the town clean. The work already done has greatly improved the appearance of the town, now let's all work together not only to keep our town clean but to continue to improve the appearance of things.

A degree of civic pride is one of the essential elements of good citizenship. The more civic pride the better citizen.

Let the Reporter Keep Your Record.—

More than anything else the Reporter enjoys the privilege of recording from week to week the efforts that are being made in our various communities for building and developing, for going ahead. The building of a new school in one community, the beginning of plans for a new school in another. The establishment of a new business or a new industry, the organization of a new club or any kind of group, whose object is to build, to make things grow.

The Reporter believes that there is going on in Shelby county a great deal of that sort of work from week to week, and we fear that some of it is being overlooked that no record is being kept.

The best agency in the world for keeping an accurate record of community growth and development is the community newspaper. We wish to appeal to our friends throughout the county that they write for the paper each week an account of every such movement in their respective communities. In addition to serving themselves in this way, their efforts will serve to inspire other people of other communities to similar undertakings. Every such effort will help to build Shelby county and enable her to take the place that is rightfully hers in the very front rank of the counties of Alabama.

Jefferson Dairymen See McElderry Pasture

A party of Jefferson county dairymen, drove to the McElderry Farms, near Munford in Talladega county, recently to see the pasture planted there three years ago under the supervision of the Central of Georgia railroad.

They were greatly pleased with what they saw and returned to their homes pledged to use similar methods in building pastures for themselves.

AN APPRECIATION

Mrs. George Dallas Barnett was born in the Kingdom neighborhood, near Columbiana, February 11, 1851, and died in her home east of town at 1 a. m. May 14th, 1924.

Between these dates that mark the temporal boundaries of an immortal spirit, a beautiful life was lived, a marvelous service was rendered, a noble, Christian character was formed, and a glorious destiny was fixed. Till the age of sixteen Sister Barnett was known and loved as Miss Frances Johnson; and then she was married to Geo. Dallas Barnett, on March 19, 1868, a young soldier of the old South, who enlisted for the whole war at the early age of fifteen. To this young couple marriage was a divine institution, a union of hearts and lives, a Scriptural partnership ordered of God and by Him consummated. As a result of this marriage eleven children came to honor their home and bless the world—three boys and eight girls; also twenty-nine grandchildren, making a splendid family of forty-two.

About twenty-one yeaars ago Sister Barnett joined the M. E. church, South, at Shelby, Ala., and in this communion she lived a loyal, consistent, faithful Christian life till the master came to keep his blesssd tryste with her. Did he find her ready? Ready? God only knows how long she had been ready—ready to go, yet willing to stay. Ready? She was ready last July when her dear life partner was translated, and no doubt it would have been glorious for her to accompany him through the valley of the Shadow, but Mother-like she knew and God knew it was better for the children for her to tarry with them a little longer; and so for about ten months she has lingered, day and night completing the preparations for her final departure to join her dear old partner by whose side as wife she walked for more than a half a century. In all the normal, vital relations of life she was true and faithful. Her children rise up to call her blessed, and her many friends delight to speak her praise and do her honor. Hers was, indeed!!

"A noble life but written not in any book of fame
Among the list of noted ones none ever saw her name;
For only her own household knew the victories she had won.
And none but they can testify how well her work was done.

At 11 a. m May 15, 1924 the funeral was held in the Columbiana Methodist church, conducted by Rev. W. A. Mays, assisted by Rev. T. K. Roberts and Rev. John Milner; and then her dear tired body was tenderly laid to rest by the side of her dear husband.

"Life's race well run,
Life's work well done;
Life's crown well won,
Now comes rest."

God be with us all till we meet in peace at Jesus feet!

"Brother Tom."

The Mark of Quality

Firestone Leads on Speedway with Five Record Breakers

When the race driver selects his tires he does so realizing that his life and chances for success depend upon them. It is significant that all of the ten money winners in the Indianapolis race were Firestone shod. Firestone, using gum-dipping and other special processes, has developed tires to such a high degree of efficiency that at Indianapolis, May 30th, the following drivers broke the world's record for 500 miles over this brick track, making many rounds at over 100 miles per hour.

Never before were tires put to such gruelling service, where it was necessary for every ounce of rubber and every fibre of fabric to work in perfect unison with every other part.

Earl Cooper	5:06:47:18	97.99

Leadership in Everyday Service

Millions of motorists are profiting by the lengthened service of Firestone tires. Scores of unsolicited testimonials emphasize the long mileage Firestone Gum-Dipped Cords deliver—which builds leadership in service, safety and economy.

Leadership on Cabs, Buses and Trucks

The largest taxicab companies in the five largest cities in the United States use Firestone Gum-Dipped Cords exclusively. One fleet alone, the Yellow Cab Co. of Chicago, uses over one-half million tire miles per day.

Firestone for years has been first to develop tires and rims complete which would meet the heavy trucking loads, great strains and demand for traction. By originating and carrying forward the Ship by Truck movement, and establishing Ship by Truck bureaus in all large cities, Firestone helped to speed up highway transportation and reduce costs.

Balloon Tire Leadership

Firestone's latest contribution to motoring is the low air pressure or Balloon Tire. This, the original full-size Balloon, was made practical by the special Firestone Gum-Dipping process, insulating every fibre of each cord, adding great strength and stamina. Firestone has also simplified the application of full-size Balloon tires to your present car by designing a special unit consisting of tires, tubes, rims and spokes applied by any dealer at a very low cost.

Leadership Against British Rubber Restriction Act

Attacking the unsound and uneconomic character of the British Rubber Restriction Act limiting the exportation of rubber from the Far East, Firestone was the one large tire manufacturer to take up the cause for the car owner. Soon after the agitation was started for America to produce rubber under its own control, the cost of crude rubber was reduced and tire prices brought back to normal.

Dealer Leadership Through Tire Quality and Service

Through Firestone dealers you can obtain organized service and the soundest values on the market, whether you need a Ford 30 x 3½ Fabric, a set of full-size Balloon Gum-Dipped Cords or a 10-inch truck tire.

August is the Vacation Month
This is the Road to Vacation Land!

A SUCCESSFUL vacation is not simply a week or two's rest. A change of scene, of climate and environment, a getting far away from the things that you're used to—a dip in the ocean—a camp in the deep woods—a wonderful period of fishing in Northern lakes or some secluded little inland stream—horse back riding over the mountains—something different from the things you do during the other fifty weeks of the year. That's the real vacation.

If you're undecided as to where to go, let an L. & N. Passenger Agent help you with information as to accommodations, costs, etc. Mountains, lakes, sea shores, inland watering places—are all reached by the superior train service of "The Old Reliable"—and remember that one of the many points of the superiority of this great railroad system is its excellent dining-car service.

PROFESSIONAL NURSE SAYS TANLAC HAS NO EQUAL

By reason of the fact that she speaks from her long experience as a professional nurse, the statement of Mrs. J. Clark of 415 Walsworth avenue, Oakland, Calif., will be of interest to all who are in need of an upbuilding tonic.

"In all my fifteen years' experience as a trained nurse," says Mrs. Clark's statement, "I never found the equal of Tanlac as a stomach medicine and tonic. Two years ago an attack of influenza left me without appetite and my stomach in such a bad fix that the little I did eat seemed to do me harm instead of good.

"Stomach pains would make me so weak I would feel right faint. The least exertion would completely exhaust me and six months before taking Tanlac I was so weak I had to hire my housework done. I was in bed most of the time for two months and was getting desperate.

"Tanlac was more than a match for my troubles and eight bottles left me feeling fine. I eat and sleep like a child and have energy and strength that makes life a pleasure. Tanlac is simply grand."

Tanlac is for sale by all good druggists. Accept no substitute. Over 40 million bottles sold.

SUNFLOWER'S RIVAL

SUNFLOWER was always so intent upon watching for Mr. Sun that she did not notice anything else until he arrived, and when one morning a tall tree growing beside the wall near her said, "Miss Dawn looked very beautiful this morning, didn't she?" Miss Sunflower looked surprised.

"Who is Miss Dawn?" she asked.

"I thought you saw everything," replied Tall Tree. "Miss Dawn is the beautiful creature that arrives before Mr. Sun and always waits for him. You see, Sunflower, you are not the only one who watches for him.

"This morning she was fair and blushing a beautiful rose-color when Mr. Sun peeped over the hill. I was watching them from my tip-top branch and he gave her a warm and bright smile, I can tell you.

"You, Miss Sunflower, will have to grow taller if you wish to catch the two, for I think she is a rival you may well fear. She is dainty and beautiful and her beauty holds one spellbound as she runs along."

Poor Sunflower could only listen with a sad heart, for well she knew she was not beautiful; but she had always supposed that she was the only one who greeted Mr. Sun and for this he loved her best always.

Tall Tree, having said enough to make Sunflower unhappy, began dancing merrily in the wind blowing over the hills, and soon forgot all he had said to poor, unhappy Sunflower.

But Sunflower thought of nothing else all day and not a wink did she sleep all night, so she might be on hand early in the morning to speak to Mr. Sun before he began his daily run.

It was rather hard for her to know just what to say to him, for though she had a sunny disposition, Sunflower was not sure he would listen kindly to chiding.

But find out, she felt she must, why Miss Dawn met Mr. Sun every morning and so when he peeked over the garden wall she said, "I am sorry I cannot get to the highest hilltop every morning to meet you, but I am not tall enough, you see.

"I am sure you must know, though, that I am always true to you, for never have I failed to watch for your coming nor does anyone watch you as you run your daily course as I do; not even Miss Dawn does that, I am sure."

Mr. Sun, being very old and very wise, began to laugh, for he knew at once what had happened. "No, my dear Miss Sunflower, no one could be as devoted as you and no one can take your place in my affections," he said.

"Wherever I am I can always see you looking at me and I could not be happy without you, and as for Miss Dawn, why, she runs away the minute I appear over the hill."

"But Tall Tree said she was very beautiful," said poor Sunflower, "and she is the first to say good morning to you."

"And you, my dear friend, are the last to say good night," replied wise Mr. Sun. "Now do not bother any more about my sister Dawn; she never stops a minute after greeting me. She is too tired out with running about to start things for the day to linger long. In fact, sometimes she is so nearly asleep that she is hardly civil."

"Your sister?" exclaimed Sunflower.

"Of course, Miss Dawn is my sister. Didn't you know that? Tall Tree knew it. I thought he told you. But I must be off to my work. Here I have lingered with you while I should have been at work; but when one has such a friend as you, my dear, it is hard to think of anything else."

Off went Mr. Sun, leaving Sunflower so happy she forgot to scold Tall Tree for making her so unhappy.

Have You This Habit?

By Margaret Morison

THE OFFICIAL ATTITUDE

AT TWENTY-TWO Patty was sure only of her sense of humor. At twenty-two, Patty found herself a penniless, friendless orphan. There was only Mr. Wicks, twice her age, the expert accountant who lived in the same boarding house and pursued her with boxes of molasses chips. Patty, in spite of her impecuniosity and her loneliness, was permanently amused at Mr. Wicks in the role of suitor.

Then, in the words of the old novels, "she knew nothing more" until she found herself installed as secretary to the great Mrs. Brindle. She was attached to her seat in the outer office, and the bell on Mrs. Brindle's desk, and the telephone, and the callers. She had become official switchboard operator between Mrs. Brindle—the chairman, the director, the president, the honorary board member and commissioner.

Ten years passed. Patty had saved her salary and invested her savings; she had been insured in every possible way; she had become the official protege of Mrs. Brindle.

Then who should turn up again but Mr. Wicks. At fifty-four Mr. Wicks was balder, and his hands were moister, and he was even more interested in his food, and more apt to tell the same story three times, than he had been when Patty at twenty-two had laughed at his amorous advances. At thirty-two Patty did not laugh; she tried to figure out how much time Mr. Wicks' wife would be obliged to spend in his company. Then, one day, she received a package of a vaguely familiar shape. Where before had she seen that pale brown paper and that pink string? Inside was a box of molasses chips. Like the pages of a book flipped open in a bracing breeze, the years flew back, and Patty laughed as she had not laughed in ten official seasons. And then she cried.

That spring Mrs. Brindle received Patty's resignation. Mrs. Brindle thought Patty had lost her mind and, with that official directness which was characteristic, told her so. But Patty answered no, that she was only trying to save her soul before the official habit had put out the last vestige of fire.

The Why of Superstitions

By H. IRVING KING

MILK DRAWS LIGHTNING

IN many rural districts they will tell you that "milk draws lightning," and that those who are engaged in milking had better stop at once when they hear the rumble of a rising thunderstorm.

This superstition is clearly an echo of a very old scandal—that little flirtation of Jupiter's with Io. The jealous Juno suspected her lord, and Jupiter, in order to conceal Io from his watchful wife, transformed her into a beautiful cow. But Juno was not to be fooled by any little trick like that and set Argus of the hundred eyes to keep watch over that same cow night and day to ascertain, if possible, whether the animal showed any signs of being a goddess in disguise, or whether she was a real cow. Thereupon Jupiter sent Mercury from High Olympus to cut Argus' head off. But Juno would not consent to Io being restored to her true form until Jupiter had solemnly promised never to flirt with the lady any more.

Now, everybody knows that thunder and lightning are but the manifestations of the wrath and power of Jupiter, "Cloud-compelling" and "thunder-bolt-wielding," the ancients called him. The man on the milking stool in the New England barn represents Argus by the side of the cow-shaped Io, and when he hears the angry thunders of Jove (Jupiter) he had better leave off milking and go into the house until the storm is over lest he, Argus, be destroyed.

MARY SUCCEEDS ON MAIN STREET

By LAURA MILLER

(© 1924, by Laura Miller)

THE GOVERNOR'S APPOINTEE

Ten years ago, when woman suffrage was a long way off in Eastern states, women holding governor's appointments were uncommon. The title of official court reporter of the Eighth judicial district, with a circuit consisting of seven counties, meant victory for the holder.

Wasn't the political training of the second United States congresswoman gained in this same field of court reporting? Anyway, Harriet Roebuck of Gainesville, Fla., not only received the appointment ten years ago, but has successfully held down the job ever since. She has had time to make friends with her fellow business women as well, for she is vice president of the Florida Federation of Business and Professional Women, which carries with it representation of her state in the national federation.

She has no hesitation about how's and why's. "Love of a hard and difficult task," is her uncompromising prescription.

Harriet Roebuck's first job was as a stenographer to a lawyer, paying $25 per month. It gave her a chance to learn the ins and outs of legal work. She learned. The court reporter appointment followed without intermediate positions, so she must have learned thoroughly.

But courts don't sit continuously. And stenographic work—especially in a university town such as Gainesville—is always in demand. Miss Roebuck has built up a letter shop doing public stenography and multigraphing. In this shop she keeps an assistant busy, and now has also a deputy to assist in the court reporting.

Although she recalls her own past hard work, she still recommends to "Miss Average Girl" a business career in such a town as Gainesville rather than a city.

"There's better opportunity for expression of personality in such a small town," she believes. "There's more consideration shown. One has opportunity for coming in closer contact with people. This enables her to serve better. The girl is likely to find herself just a machine in a big city, though for the exceptional young woman I believe the city might offer greater opportunities in a financial way. For myself, the pleasure of knowing the people whom I serve in these various counties and of being able to call many of them friend is after all the most interesting phase of my work. I do not think that would happen in a great city."

THE ONLY GENUINE CATTLE QUEEN

There's only one cattle sales manager in the world who wears petticoats, and carries on her business outside the pages of fiction. She's "not more than five feet tall, with delicate features, flyaway blonde curls, dimples in both cheeks, and a charming habit of slurring all her r's when she talks," according to an acquaintance.

Mrs. J. Riley Green of Wolfe City, Tex., likes to buy her clothes on Fifth avenue—when she has time. That is to say, if a cattle dealer's convention takes her to New York on business. "I haven't even time for parties often," she declares, "though I do keep up my church connections and keep in touch with my friends."

She has a regular office fitted up in the ranch house. Here she traces pedigrees, plans sales and works up the advertising for auctions. She issues a regular cow's blue book, with ten generations to the genealogy. She goes out with Mr. Green on purchasing and selling trips, and—her own special idea—manages his herd's diet kitchen.

Her job is a real job. Seven years ago, Mrs. Green turned her general interests in Jersey cattle into an offer to do her husband's bookkeeping. Then she listened to conversations with customers.

One day she volunteered an argument that made the sale. Next came a course in scientific salesmanship. The Texas Jersey Cattle club offered her the post of secretary. No woman had ever tackled such a job. But it was wartime, the club was in debt—and probably they asked her to work cheap. In three years she had turned a deficit into an $800 balance, had won the Jersey Bulletin prize for the best club work in the United States or Canada, and topped the sales record of every state club.

Thereupon she won an honor that she appreciates at its full worth. Her husband offered her the job of sales manager for his herd at the salary he would pay a man. "It's great sport," is her conclusion, "though it means plenty of hard work. As for Mr. Green's feeling about it—well, we've been married 25 years and we've never been more congenial than now. Often strangers take us for mere acquaintances because we so enjoy talking to each other."

"What's in a Name?"

By MILDRED MARSHALL

FACTS about your name; it's history; meaning; whence it was derived; significance; your lucky day and lucky jewel

ELSIE

FROM a casual survey it seems almost incredible that Elsie and Adelaide should be practically the same name. Yet such is the case since Elsie is the last and most contracted English form of popular Adelaide.

Signifying "noble cheer," Elsie has its source in the old Teutonic prefix "Aethel" or "Adel," meaning noble. Adalheit was one of the first feminine names formed from it, and was much in use among the daughters in Frankland. Adelheid, another form, named many of the feudal princesses of the Tenth and Eleventh centuries. Adelaide is the French and English version.

Elsie is the seventh step in the succession of the English favorite. It is reached through Adeline Adeliza, Adela, Alice, Alicia. No other country has ever used it, except Germany, which has an old form, Else, very popular among the peasants

In this country, however, Elsie is a distinct name, free of all previous association with Adelaide or its other immediate predecessors.

Malachite is Elsie's lucky stone. It is an Egyptian gem which, to be lucky, should be engraved with an image of the sun. For Elsie, it promises peace and protection from all evil. It is likewise a cure for insomnia, and according to an old superstition, is particularly lucky for children, giving them sound sleep and immunity from disease, if attached to their cradles. Tuesday is Elsie's lucky day and 6 is her lucky number.

DAY-MAKERS ALL

YOU do not like the day?
Flat, dull and stale, you say?
Well, take this little hint
from me, my son,
That's just the kind of day to work upon.
If it be flat turn to and give it flavor
To overcome its lack of taste and savor.
If it be dull from out your stores of light
Strive you to make it luminously bright;
And where 'tis stale with your own stores of wit
Take it in hand and therewith freshen it.
You may not know it, but in age or youth
A day is but a span of time, in truth,
And none have dawned upon the calendar,
But man himself has made them what they are.

Rumania's New Lands

Rumanian Girl Coming From Market.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

Rumania has been made larger by additions of territory taken from neighbors in the past and is now in the somewhat unpleasant situation of having the unwilling contributors anxious about a new deal. While Russia wants Bessarabia, which was a province for a hundred years until the close of the World war, Bulgaria on the other side is said to be seeing with desire Dobrudja, a strip of territory which she formerly owned along the Black sea coast. These two "ethnic problems" are worrying the Rumanian rulers while in the heart of old Rumania a near revolution is smoldering.

Bessarabia has changed hands several times between Rumania and Russia and may well be called the Alsace-Lorraine of southeast Europe. An American observer set down without information in the prairie land might at first easily imagine himself in rural Indiana or Ohio.

Tasseled Indian corn, from seed brought from America, rustles in the breeze while ripples play over seas of yellow wheat. Earth black as Illinois "gumbo" lies beneath one's feet. When land like this brings from $200 to $400 an acre in the United States, it is clear why both Russia and Rumania, after five years' discussion punctuated with armed threats, still make counter claims to Bessarabia.

Geologically Bessarabia is allied to Russia, including as it does, the tail end of the black earth belt of Russian prairies. But even Russian census figures state that more than half Bessarabia's population is Rumanian. In feudal days there arose in what now is Rumania, the house of Bassarab. One of the princes is said to have established Moldavia, which, with Wallachia, established by another prince of the same house, helped make up pre-war Rumania. Bessarabia takes its name from the family. This bit of history is not forgotten in Rumania's "irridenta" program.

Russia's Claim to Bessarabia.

Rumania, variously considered, is 800 years old, 65 years old, or 6 years old. Bessarabia was the extreme outpost of the Roman dominion, Dacia, which, in the time of Trajan comprised all of what now is Greater Rumania. Only Wallachia and Moldavia were included in the familiar Rumanian "boot" which made up the autonomous Rumania as first carved out of Turkey in Europe, in 1859. Independent Greater Rumania, 6 years old, was born when the Versailles treaty allotted Transylvania and Bucovina; Bessarabia was annexed after repeated requests from the principality's peasant council, which first attempted to establish a republic.

Rumania's three ages are the key to the condition of Bessarabia, which has the air of being part of one of the oldest nations of Europe and yet bears the marks of the green pioneer stage of Nebraska in overland mail days. Like the American pioneer, the Bessarabian peasant is sufficient unto himself. He builds his own house from materials at hand, his fields supply wheat and corn, his stock supplies his meat and his flax the fiber which his wife and daughter spin, weave and dye. His private still brews corn whisky or "tsuica," a fragrant plum brandy. Only recently have aniline dyes replaced natural herb dyes for the brilliant peasant costumes. Independence is a prime virtue in a country which has only 530 miles of railroad and only 60 miles of improved highway.

The household obeys the pioneer rule that everybody works. From the child who drives the geese to the pond, to the patriarch who closes the gate after the oxen, each has his duties. Schools command scant attention where there is work for every hand and therefore only 40 per cent of Bessarabian men and only 5 per cent of the women are literate. The pioneer influence is further shown in Bucharest, capital of Rumania, where nearly every house has land around it, unlike the wall-to-wall style of many European capitals.

How Dobrudja Was Acquired.

A striking contrast is semi-arid Dobrudja, a "consolation prize" to Rumania—at Bulgaria's expense—on one occasion when Russia took a slice of Bessarabia. After Rumania gained a sort of independence from Turkey it was wholly cut off from the Black sea by the region known as the Dobrudja. The only outlet was through one of the badly silted mouths of the Danube. The same Turko-Russian war that created Bulgaria and Serbia resulted in Dobrudja's addition to Rumania. The latter looked upon the Dobrudja, even with its sugar-coating of a port, as a bitter pill at first because of the loss of a slice of Bessarabia. The Dobrudja was largely a region of bare foothills, steppes, sand dunes and lagoons, peopled with Tatars, Turks, Bulgarians and other non-Rumanians. Its one saving grace was its port, Constantza.

A railroad had been built under the Turks from Constantza to the Danube, which marked the old Rumanian boundary. There, however, the river and its broad bordering marshes seemed an impassable barrier. Not until 1895 was the great Cerno Voda bridge over the Danube opened. This huge structure, one of the greatest bridges in the world, with its several viaducts and approaches, is about 12 miles long. Its completion made Constantza really accessible for the first time and gave Rumania a usable salt water port. In the meantime many of the non-Rumanians had moved out of the Dobrudja, the district had become somewhat Rumanized, and is now recognized as a real asset with which Rumania would not think of parting.

Even immediately after the exit of the Turks from Kustenje, as they called Constantza, the city was largely rebuilt, wide streets were provided and cleanliness and order replaced dirt and slovenliness.

Constantza a Great Port.

With its coming into its own as Rumania's chief seaport, Constantza has been built up along western lines. Large grain elevators were constructed to handle the country's wheat exports. A pipe line was run from the oil fields across the Cerno Voda bridge, huge petroleum tanks were built in Constantza, and the port became a sort of rival of Batum, oil export city of old Russia at the opposite end of the Black sea. Breakwaters and other harbor works were constructed and the port was made headquarters for a Rumanian naval flotilla. Little more than a hamlet in Turkish days, the city now has a population of between 30,000 and 50,000.

There has been a town on the site of Constantza for many centuries. At the beginning of the Christian era the town was Tomi; and there the Roman poet Ovid, banished by Augustus, died in exile in 17 A. D.

Bulgaria's desire to get back her old Dobrudja possession was used during the World war when German troops led Bulgarian forces into their old province. Through this move the Central powers cut Rumania off from the sea and brought about the destruction of the great Cerna Voda bridge. In case of a German victory Dobrudja undoubtedly would have been restored permanently to Bulgaria. But when Germany was defeated the Bulgarians saw the coveted region again slip out of their grasp and back into the arms of Rumania. Since the World war the huge bridge and the petroleum pipe lines it carried have been restored, the damage that alien fleets and armies did to Constantza has been repaired, and the port is again functioning as Rumania's chief Black sea outlet.

SUNLIGHT

WE ARE just beginning to appreciate the value of sunlight as a health-producer.

The ancient people worshiped the sun, which they recognized as the source of all energy and life. Modern science is proving what the ancient civilizations believed.

King Tut has had more front-page publicity in the last two years than any living man. His name is known today to ten times as many people as ever heard of him while he was alive. King Tut was a sun-worshiper, as were many of the people of his day.

The Greeks took sun baths regularly. The Romans knew that sunlight is of benefit in healing sores and infections and in maintaining health. Pliny, the Roman historian, writes that his aged friend Spurinna kept himself youthful by taking an hour's sunbath every day.

When civilization moved from southern to central and northern Europe, people wore heavy clothing and lived in houses and forgot the value of sunlight.

Dr. Rollier of Switzerland reports remarkable cures of tuberculosis in children by the use of sunlight. Dr. Lo Grosso, medical director of J. N. Adams Memorial hospital at Perrysburg, N. Y., gets wonderful results in bone and skin tuberculosis by undressing the children and keeping them in the sunshine and fresh air. Even in winter the children wear nothing but overshoes to keep their feet dry and caps to protect their heads and ears.

Dr. Lo Grosso says, "With the exception of one or two isolated hospitals we are neglecting the greatest of all healers, the sun. Our eyes are cast down, whereas healing is from the skies."

Sunlight kills disease germs in a short time. The more sunlight we have in our houses the healthier we are. The more we get out in the sunlight the healthier our bodies will be.

Exposure of the skin to sunlight lowers blood pressure, increases the depth of respiration, dilates the blood vessels and brings the blood to the surface. The number of blood corpuscles is increased, as well as the power of resisting disease.

This remedy must be used with common sense. A sunburn is just as painful and as bad as any other kind of burn. Don't go out the first day the bathing beaches are open and lie all day in the sunlight. Don't try to get the tan in a few days of summer vacation that should have accumulated all through the year. Get the good effects of the sun without the bad effects. Get outdoors every day all the year round, especially in the summer, and get the benefit of the healing and stimulating effect of sunlight—the source of all heat, light and life in the universe.

WHY RISK LIFE TO SAVE 5 MINUTES?

PUNCTUALITY is a virtue. But even virtue can be carried too far.

Samuel E. Freundlich, sixty years old, had been employed by one firm for over thirty years and in all that time he had never been late. He lived at Rosehill, a Chicago suburb, and took the 7:06 a. m. train every morning. The other day he was a few minutes late and reached the station just as the train was pulling out. He ran to catch it, jumped for the platform, missed it and went under the wheels. He lost both of his legs and probably his life.

We are all creatures of habit. Regularity and punctuality are highly commendable characteristics. But they aren't worth risking your life for.

It's better to break your record than to break your neck. Be on time, by all means, but when an occasional miscalculation makes you a few minutes late, don't risk your life in order to maintain your record.

Men who are sixty years old haven't any business running after trains, anyhow. It's all right for the boy or the young man. But the muscle fibers of the heart are like rubber. When you are young they can stretch, even beyond the ordinary, without permanent injury. But by middle life the heart muscle is like old rubber. It's all right as long as you don't put an unusual strain on it, but if it's stretched, it's apt to break.

Men and women over forty-five, and especially over fifty, should avoid sudden, extreme and unusual exertion. If the heart muscle is not diseased, it's fully equal to the ordinary, everyday strain which is put on it. But sudden and severe exertion may cause serious if not fatal consequences. Unusual exertion increases the rate and force of the heart's action. The heart is like a rubber ball. If it is overstrained, it stretches. This may cause acute dilatation of the heart, sometimes severe enough to produce death, or it may result in stretching the valves of the heart so that they never work properly thereafter.

Many serious heart conditions have their origin in some unusual exertion, which is often unnecessary. If you are middle-aged or past, don't run after street cars or trains. Wait until the next one comes, even if you are a little late. This may require five or ten minutes' waiting, but it may mean several years longer life.

To Sufferers from

PAIN, COLDS, HEADACHES

Here are four reasons why BRO-ASPRIN is being used more and more by people who formerly used plain aspirin, as well as by those who were unable to take aspirin of any kind.

1. BRO-ASPRIN helps remove the cause of colds, fever, headaches and la grippe, at the same time giving immediate relief.
2. BRO-ASPRIN hasn't the unpleasant after effects of plain aspirin. The mild vegetable laxative eliminates the aspirin after relief has been given.
3. BRO-ASPRIN keeps the pores of the skin closed. Many remedies open them, increasing the likelihood of the patient developing a severe cold or pneumonia.
4. BRO-ASPRIN is free from all habit-forming or dangerous drugs.

EXCHANGEITES HEAR FARM BUREAU LEADER

At the meeting of the Exchange Club on Thursday of last week, C. L. Massey, Field Worker of the Alabama Farm Bureau Cotton Marketing Association, was present and he gave a very interesting talk on conditions in Alabama that affect the farmer and told something of the activities of the Farm Bureau.

Mr. Massey stated that co-operative marketing, which is one of the major activities of the Farm Bureau, was begun over 100 years ago in Switzerland. Since that time in various countries farmers have joined together to market their products, particularly dairy and poultry products, to their great profit. Today, he said it is not unusual for the farmer in these countries to get 75 to 90 per cent of the consumers' price for his products, while in the United States the farmers gets back an average of 32 per cent of the price the consumers pay.

Mr. Massey said there is no good reason why cotton can not be handled cooperatively even to much better advantage than dairy and poultry products, since it is the one crop that does not deteriorate in value when held over even from year to year.

Mr. Massey appealed to members of the Exchange Club to realize that farming is the basic industry of Shelby county and to give their support to every effort that may be made for improving farming conditions in the county.

Following Mr. Massey's address Judge L. B. Riddle offered a motion endorsing the work of the Farm Bureau and pledging the support of the club to its work and also to the work of County Agent A. A. Lauderdale and J. F. Montgomery, teacher of Vocational Agriculture in the High School. The motion was adopted unanimously and with enthusiasm.

Today, he received replies assuring him the plans nad specifications were well under way and Before a great while, advertisements will be made for bids.

This will be gratifying news to citizens all over the state. This is especially true, inasmuch as Alabama College is located at Montevallo and is making rapid strides in its development. Railway and highway facilities should keep pace with the growth of the college.

SAYS DAIRY COW WILL BRING PROSPERITY

Through the efforts of the Service Club of Oneonta, an organization whose aims and purposes are similar to those of the exchange Club of Columbiana, the farmers of Blount county had the privilege recently of hearing several addresses by H. S. Mobley, one of the workers in the Extension Department of the International Harvester Company.

Whatever else may be said about the International Harvester Company no one questions the fact that their Extension workers are among the ablest and most practical to be found in the country. Mr. Mobley, a southern man, is one of the outstanding authorities on dairying in the country.

In his address at Oneonta, Mr. Mobley told in a practical way some of his experience and observations on dairying in the South and in other parts of the country as well. He said;

"That the cow will prove to be the salvation of the southern farmer.

"That in most instances it is better to sell butter fat and feed the skim milk to pigs and chickens.

"That in Iowa farmers make a profit on milk at 13 cents a gallon.

"That one of the best ways to improve soil is through the dairy cow.

"That the reason some men don't like to keep cows is that it is such a steady job; but that the man who does not want a steady job does not deserve success.

"That there are only two cash-paying crops, the butter producing cow and the egg laying hen. You give them the feed and in 24 hours they pay you for it.

"That the hen that does not lay over 55 eggs a year will make her owner a profit; but that it is just as easy to keep a hen that will lay 200 eggs a year."

The Oneonta Southern Democrat says that if the advice Mr. Mobley gave the farmers were put into practice, they would soon become loaners of money instead of borrowers.

GIST'S LETTER ON CROP CONDITIONS

FORECASTS 850,000 BALE COTTON CROP. STATES OTHER CROPS ARE PROGRESSING SATISFACTORILY

Montgomery.—If the cotton crop of Alabama this year continues as good as at present until harvest the state ought to produce about 850,000 bales of 500 pounds gross weight each, according to the condition found to exist on July 16, which was 70 per cent of normal. This condition indicates an acre yield of 132 pounds, and the acreage now growing is 3,190,000. This would be the largest amount of cotton produced in this state since 1915, when slightly more than a million bales were grown.

The condition figure is the same today as on the 2nd instant, but indicates about four pounds more yield per acre, according to the ratios between the average condition and yield of former years. Consequently the crop has really improved in prospect since the 25th of June.

During the period between the two reports an average of 5 rainy days has occurred, with an average of slightly more than three inches of rainfall. These rains have, however, fallen almost exclusively in the afternoon and following forenoons of intense heat and sunshine. As a consequence nothing like the number of blooms have fallen as if the rains had come in the forenoon while the blooms were open to catch the fall. Neither have the weevil multiplied so fast as if the remainder of the days been cloudy and damp, as occurs usually with morning rains.

Only 30 per cent of the reports received for this report mentioned the weevil as a damaging factor, and quite a number remarked that while the weevil was present the usual damage did not seem to be taking place.

The plant has grown rapidly and fruited heavily; probably the result of more extended and better fertilization. Fields are fairly clean and in good cultivation. Imperfect stands are still noticeable, this being the only serious drawback to an otherwise bright prospect.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF.

There will be no more night sessions in the circuit courts of Alabama in trial of jury cases, except by agreement of counsel. The new Alabama Code of 1923, makes this provision in section 6672. In the former code it was provided that the courts of the several judicial circuits of the state should not be opened before 11 a. m. of the first Monday set for the trial of jury cases, but there was no provision as to what hour the court should ajourn. The section of the new code, already referred to, retains the provision as to the hour of opening court, but specifies in addition that in any event the court shall not engage in the trial of cases later than 7 p. m. each day except by agreement of counsel. This addition was made by the commission, in revision of the code.

Protest has been filed with the Alabama Public Service commission in Montgomery by the Anniston Traffic association against the publication of increased rates on vegetables shipped from Mobile to that city. It is alleged that the advances are unreasonable, that the proper parity is not being maintained between this point and other consuming centers and that the proposed rates will impose a serious handicap upon the produce dealers of Anniston.

A great family reunion was held last week at Union Chapel, six miles east of Jasper, when the Black family held their annual reunion. This reunion was well attended by hundreds of visitors from every section of the county and some visitors from other counties were present. A feature of the reunion was the picnic lunch served. Several prominent speakers made short addresses.

Through the efforts of the Alabama Public Service commission a modification of the decision of the interstate commerce commission in the famous Meridian case affecting rates on cotton, clay, concrete and shale products and gravel, has been recommended in the report of the examiner of the interstate commerce commission who heard the evidence on the request for modification of the original order.

Recent seizure by Sheriff Cazalas of Mobile and his deputies of the liquor amounting to 100 cases aboard the United States Shipping Board boat "Saccarappi" has raised an interesting legal problem. Solicitor Bart Chamberlain announced that he is investigating the matter with a view to finding out whether the state can issue condemnation proceedings against the vessel.

Charging that he lost his job with the Louisville & Nashville Railroad company as the result of a garnishment run on his wages by the defendants, B. F. Roberts filed suit in the Jefferson circuit court to recover $25,000 as damages from W. C. McCarty and R. E. McCarty, trading under the name of McCarty Brokerage company. Roberts set out in his petition that he borrowed $25 from the defendants; that he paid back $60, and that they claimed he still owed $25, for which the garnishment was secured. He asks for judgment for an additional sum of $75 with interest for money he alleges defendants received from him in 1923 and 1924.

In a liquor raid made in the vicinity of Bull's Gap, near Talladega Deputy Berry Campbell and Enforcement Officer John H. Draper and H. G. Garrett discovered a double distilling outfit, the only one of its kind ever seized in Talladega county. It was in operation when the officers captured it. DeWitt Harding and Lee Bryant were placed under arrest and four gallons of liquor seized. Mr. Campbell, who has been connected with the Talladega sheriff's office for five years, said that this outfit was the first one making pure doubled distilled corn liquor he has ever seen raided. Harding and Bryant were released under a $500 bond.

Travel over the Roy bridge on the Birmingham-Montgomery highway can be resumed in about two weeks, according to announcement of Thomas S. Edwards, county engineer. Members of the party included Mayor Fred Latta, Alderman H. A. Porter and F. M. Chaffin of Columbia.

The Staples & Cunningham lime works at Limrock have begun operations. The raw material is there in abundance, and this new industry for Jackson county promises to be prosperous and successful. A number of years ago lime was manufactured at that place by F. O. Hurt and this lime was greatly in demand all over the country.

An educational program for care of children is being carried out in the rural communities by the Jefferson county health department that is proving of great value to the mothers of the various sections. The nurses provided under the Shepherd-Towner bill appropriation makes the educational program possible, and instructive talks are given once every month in each of the populous sections in the county.

Dr. G. B. Stewart, who owns an apple orchard on Manchester Star Route, near Clar Creek Falls, in Walker county, stated that the outlook for a bumper apple crop this year was bright. Dr. Stewart expects to harvest not less than 4,000 bushels of apples this season, on which he expects to realize upwards of $2 a bushel on an average.

After a recent survey the J. B. McCrary Co. has submitted to the town council estimates and plans for a system of water works for Columbiana. One estimate, which includes well, steel tank and pipe lines, places the cost at $29,902.75, while the other, with the well more centrally located, would cost $22,483.19.

S. V. Bacon and Miss Lillian Held of New York have leased Rahe's lake near Attalla and will convert it into one of the largest pleasure resorts in the state, it is announced. The lake will be enlarged to cover 10 acres and improvements calling for expenditures of $15,0000 will be made.

Lesson for August 3

THE FIRST DISCIPLES OF JESUS

LESSON TEXT—John 1:35-51.

GOLDEN TEXT—"Jesus saith unto him, Follow me."—John 1:43.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Calls Four Helpers.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus' First Followers.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—What It Means to Follow Jesus.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Winning Others to Christ.

Through the testimony of John the Baptist, his disciples were pointed to Jesus. This same testimony he gave the previous day, but he was not ashamed to repeat his sermon. His theme was the Lamb of God, the sin bearer of the world.

I. Two of John's Disciples Follow Jesus (vv. 35-37).

As a result of the Baptist's testimony two of his disciples left him and followed Jesus. One of these disciples was Andrew (v. 40), and presumably the other was John. When the Baptist pointed out Jesus as the Lamb of God, the long-expected Messiah, these disciples sought further acquaintance with Jesus. In view of John's request, they looked upon the Lord. This look was sufficient to induce them to follow Jesus. They believed.

II. The Two Disciples Abiding With Jesus (vv. 38, 39).

1. Jesus' Question (v. 38). When Jesus saw the disciples following He most kindly inquired as to their object.

2. The Disciples' Reply (v. 39). They answered his question by inquiring as to His dwelling place. Their reply showed their desire to go apart privately where they could disclose their hearts to Him. Knowing their hearts, He invited them to His place of abode.

III. The Disciples Bringing Others to Jesus (vv. 40).

The very genius of Christianity is self-propagation. The usual method is to begin with those nearest us—home folks and relatives—and pass out to ever-widening circles. The disciples who were with Jesus in blessed fellowship go at once to tell others of the priceless treasure they have found.

1. Andrew Brings Peter (vv. 40-42). This is a beautiful sight of brotherly affection expressing itself in bringing another to Christ. The best place to begin our testimony for Christ is among our kinsfolk (Luke 8:39). This was a great piece of work for Andrew, for Peter became one of the pillars of the church of God.

2. Philip Bringing Nathaniel (vv. 43-46). Christ found Philip the following day as he would go forth into Galilee. Philip followed Him in response to a personal invitation. As soon as Christ found Philip, Philip found Nathaniel and witnessed to him concerning the messiahship of Jesus. He said unto him, "We have found Him, of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth" (v. 45). Nathaniel was somewhat skeptical, but he was honest. Philip had the wisdom not to argue with him, but brought him to Jesus. The one who is honest when brought into the presence of Jesus will soon have all doubts removed (John 7:17).

IV. Nathaniel, Seeing and Hearing Jesus, Testifies to His Divinity (vv. 47-51).

As soon as Nathaniel saw and heard Jesus all his doubts rolled away. He who acts upon the light given shall see greater things (vv. 50, 51). Angels ascending and descending upon the Son of Man with the open heavens, shows that Jesus Christ is the means of communication between earth and heaven (Heb. 10:19, 20; Eph. 2:18; Gen. 28:12).

This narrative concerning the experiences of the first disciples exhibits the following stages of Christian experiences:

1. Hearing About Jesus (v. 36). How important it is that the minister and teacher have a proper conception of Jesus as the sacrificial Lamb, the sin-bearer of the world.

2. Looking Upon Jesus (v. 36). It is necessary that the sinner definitely fix his attention upon Jesus.

3. Following Jesus (v. 37). It is not enough to merely look upon Him. There must be definite efforts to follow after, to inquire of Him.

4. Abiding With Jesus (v. 39). Those who earnestly look upon Jesus and inquire after Him He welcomes into blessed fellowship.

5. Witnessing for Jesus (vv. 41, 45). The first thing the one does who has come to Jesus is to begin to witness for Him.

6. Bringing Others to Jesus. The chief delight of the one who has come to know Jesus by a personal experience is to bring others to Him.

Success

"First of all," said President Garfield when a boy, "I must make myself a man; if I do not succeed in that I can succeed in nothing."

Good Temper

The difficult part of good temper consists in accommodation to the ill humor of others.

Duty Omitted

Every duty omitted obscures some truth that we should know.—Ruskin.

Interesting New Silhouettes; Children's Knitted Frocks

THE youthful smart set declares its preference for suits which exploit an entirely new silhouette. The short jacket type is youth's latest selection. It is interesting to note that the suit in the picture shows a trace of Spanish influence in its bolerolike coatee. This is not surprising for the forecast for autumn bears the message that we are again turning to romantic Spain for style inspiration. Departing also from the ordinary is the manner of buttoning the skirt over the blouse. The material, too, selected for this youthful suit is exclusive, being a caramel-brown serge with white hairline stripe.

Shows Spanish Influence.

It is the garconne types in fine woolens which seem to please youth most this season. These simple woolen affairs choose fine cashmere, wool jersey and sporty-looking flannels striped and plaided for their making. If not a suit, then two-piece jumper costume in slim boyish lines is selected, favoring colors gray, beige, cocoa, cinnamon and poudre bleu.

A jumper suit of gray kasha has the skirt absolutely plain at the back, crowding to the front in a panel of knife plaits. This idea of the fullness being to the front is indicative of the newer modes. To continue, the jumper of same material accompanying this front-panel skirt is severely plain. It is caught into a narrow hip-band, has long sleeves and an adjustable collar which may be thrown open or buttoned high about the throat.

Checks and plaids are very popular. The fanciful weaves made up with plain cloth are especially recommended, such as a skirt checked in brown and beige wool with a solid-colored coat cuffed and collared with the checks.

Large plaids are prominent in the weaves of novel effect. "They say" so popular has plaid become that next fall we will be wearing suits whose coats and capes are lined with plaid. Just now the trotteur of plaid wool or silk consists often of skirt and jumper, with which is worn prim lace collar with deep lace cuffs, and there should be to complete the girlish ensemble a bow of picot-edged ribbon or two-toned, the streamers of which must reach below the waistline.

In the styling of knitted wear for the kiddies genius is covering itself with glory. When buying for the little ones, mothers do well to tour the juvenile knitted outerwear departments and take mental inventory of the running garments fashioned so charmingly for tots and older children too. It is surprising how completely knitted costume covers every phase of infant and junior dress requirements these days.

Just now, the knitted pantie-frock claims the designer's special attention, for it is so eminently practical that it should be included in every child's wardrobe. Non-wrinkable, non-crushable, non-shrinkable, are three virtues ascribed to these knitted frocks. Small wonder that knitted togs have become such a popular juvenile vogue.

Delightful coloring marks the pantie-frock shown on the tot seated to the left in the picture. Its basic color is powder blue, the hem of the smock gaily bordered in pale yellow and orange. There is a piping of black, plain-knit, about the sleeves and neck.

The standing figure is prettily frocked in a knitted slip of powder blue worsted, the same falling straight from the neck, because fashion approves the beltless mode especially this season. There is an inter-knitting done in petal pink, forming a deep border design. The matching panties are knitted, too. The manner in which this little frock fastens at the shoulder shows a touch of genius which adds greatly to the attractiveness of this dainty frock.

It is possible to get very clever and practical models in tan, tangerine, copen, navy and other colored knit-jersey models which solve the problem of school and playtime clothes.

In the matter of vacation time bathing suits, there is where knitted wear radiates its happiest color and cleverest styling. The latest knitted models stress brilliant tunic designs for the smaller children, with two-piece suits in striped and allover gay patterned woolens for the older girls.

As Cunning as Can Be.

Bright color is the outstanding note in children's bathing and beach togs, especially emphasizing cardinal, cerise and that very popular combination scarlet with white.

MARY SUCCEEDS ON MAIN STREET

By LAURA MILLER

THE FACTORY AND THE FAMILY

When Mrs. Ehmann was widowed, there was obviously nothing to do except to have her son leave home for some job that would keep himself and the family going. San Francisco was the nearest city to the half-deserted mining town of Oroville where the Ehmanns lived. So to San Francisco the boy went. A wholesale hardware store put him on as a traveling salesman, and the family was—though not by too wide a margin—saved from penury.

On a trip home the boy gazed up at the neglected olive trees on the hillside. "Had some queer ripe olives to eat the other day," he remarked casually. "Tasted good, too. But they're imported all the way from Spain, so they cost too much for me to bring you some. You might try pickling these."

From his remark grew a trip across the bay to the university next time he was in the city. There, apparently the only place in California, was filed away a recipe for pickling ripe olives. Mrs. Ehmann found an empty keg or two, which for lack of room indoors, she had to prop up under the house porch on the sloping mountainside. When her son came home, she opened a jar of ripe olives. "Um-m," he said judicially, "good, but not quite as good as those imported fellows."

"Try these," said his mother, holding out another open jar. "I thought I'd experiment a bit with that recipe."

"Why, mother, I could sell those as a sideline to the hardware job!" said the boy. "Can you do it again?"

"Oh, yes," said the woman who loved her kitchen, "I've kept a copy of just what I did. But you'll like this third batch still better." And he did. So did the "trade," when he began to peddle Ehmann's olives on his route. So, gradually, did the rest of the United States, as the keg under the porch grew into a factory that put money into the pockets of Oroville "hands."

For the Ehmanns have never become too self-important for the little mountainside town. The business started of necessity as a family industry. A family industry so far as possible it has remained. The tiny house with the porch hung over the mountainside has become a house that is plenty big enough for comfort, even when the grandchildren are at home, but that lacks all the ostentation of the typical "new-rich folks'" mansion. And the devotion of these same grandchildren, together with the occasional presidency of the Oroville W. C. T. U., have proved quite enough honor to satisfy the founder of the first ripe olive business in America.

BOOK AGENTS AND VISIONS

We sat in a little restaurant out in Mankato, Minn., and talked of many things. Two things I chiefly remember. One was the enthusiasm and determination that Josephine Sizer was putting into her new job of being president of the Minnesota W. C. T. U.

The other was the story of how she got her training in leading folks. That she does lead them is evidenced by the fact that some 20,000 people annually go to hear her lecture, especially in churches, camp meetings and Bible institutes.

Once upon a time, so the story ran, Mrs. Sizer was far from well. The doctor prescribed an absolute change of scene, new people, new interests. Now Josephine Sizer was the shy, devoted wife of a Methodist minister. She shrank not only from strangers, but from anything that would make her prominent even among her husband's congregation. And the family purse was the proverbially lean article possessed by a country minister.

As she did her housework, dreams of far people and places born of the doctor's prescription slipped into her mind. And along came a stranger who made those vague dreams real. Under his arm was a volume of a famous series of lectures. Warmed by his listener's attention, he grew eloquent. Finally, "Why, those books are as good as a trip!" exclaimed the woman.

An adroit question from the man, and her story was out. Her enthusiasm for the travel lectures persisted. The stranger saw its value to his company. He persuaded her, the shy little woman, to share her vision with other housebound women. She learned to talk, to sell ideas as well as books. She regained her health. She made money.

Then—"Why, if I have this gift," she said to herself, "I ought to put it to still better service." So she has done so.

Condensations

"De man dat loafs on his job in dis life," said Uncle Eben, "may have to work overtime explainin' in de next one."

Zen of The Y.D.

A NOVEL OF THE FOOTHILLS

by Robert Stead

AUTHOR OF "THE COW PUNCHER" "THE HOMESTEADERS" "NEIGHBORS" ETC

COPYRIGHT BY ROBERT STEAD

"YOU WILL BE STOPPED"

SYNOPSIS. — Transley's haying outfit, after stacking 600 tons, is on its way to the Y.D. ranch headquarters. Transley is a master of men and circumstances. Linder, foreman, substantial, but not self-assertive. George Drazk, one of the men, is an irresponsible chap who proposes to every woman he meets. Transley and Linder dine with Y.D. and his wife and daughter Zen. Transley resolves to marry Zen. Y.D. instructs Transley to cut the South Y.D., "spite o' h—l an' high water" and a fellow named Landson. Drazk proposes to Zen and is neatly rebuffed.

George dropped behind, and an amused smile played on the foreman's face. He had known Drazk too long to be much surprised at anything he might do. It was Drazk's idea of gallantry to make love to every girl on the ranch. Possibly Drazk had managed to exchange a word with Zen, and his imagination would readily expand that into a love scene. Zen! Even the cool, balanced Linder felt a slight quicken in the blood at the unusual name which suggested the bright girl who had come into his life the night before. Not exactly into his life; it would be fairer to say she had touched the rim of his life. Perhaps she would further penetrate it further; Linder never expected that would be the case. As for Drazk—she was in no danger from him. Drazk's methods were so precipitous that they could be counted upon to defeat themselves.

Below stretched the valley of the South Y.D., almost a duplicate of its northern neighbor. The stream hugged the feet of the hills on the northern side of the valley; its ribbon of green and gold was like a fringe gathered at the hem of their skirts. Between the stream lay the level plains of the valley, and miles to the south rose the next ridge of foothills. It was from these interlying plains that Linder expected his thousand tons of hay.

Linder's appreciative eye took in the scene; a scene of stupendous sizes and magnificent distances. As he idly turned his vision eastward a speck in the distance caught his sight and brought him to his feet. Shading his eyes from the bright afternoon sun he surveyed it long and carefully. There was no doubt about it; a hay-making outfit was already at work down the valley.

Leaving his team to manage themselves Linder dropped from his wagon and joined Transley. "Some one has beat us to it," he remarked.

"So I observed," said Transley. "Well, it's a big valley, and if they're satisfied to stay where they are there should be enough for both. If they're not—"

"If they're not, what?" demanded Linder.

"You heard what Y.D. said. He said: 'Cut it, spite o' h—l an' high water,' and I always obey orders."

They wound down the hillside until they came to the stream, the horses quickening their pace with the smell of water in their eager nostrils. It was a good ford, broad and shallow, with the typical bowlder bottom of a mountain stream. The horses waded into it, drinking greedily with the sort of droning noise caused by the bits in their mouths. When they had satisfied their thirst they raised their heads, stretched their noses far out and champed wide-mouthed upon their bits.

After a pause in the stream they drew out on the farther bank, where were open spaces among cottonwood trees, and Transley indicated that this should be their camping ground. Already smoke was issuing from the chuck wagon, and in a few minutes the men's sleeping tent and the two stable tents were flashing back the afternoon sun. They carried no eating tent; instead of that an eating wagon was backed up against the chuck wagon, and the men were served in it. They had not paused for a midday meal; the cook had provided sandwiches of bread and roast beef to dull the edge of their appetite, and now all were keen to fall to soon as the welcome clanging of the plow-colter which hung from the end of the chuck wagon should give the signal.

Presently this clanging filled the evening air with sweet music, and the men filed with long, slouchy tread into the eating wagon. The table ran down the center, with bench seats at either side. The cook, properly gauging the men's appetites, had not taken time to prepare meat and potatoes, but on the table were ample basins of graniteware filled with beans and bread and stewed prunes and canned peaches, pitchers of sirup and condensed milk, tins with marmalade and jam, and plates with butter sadly suffering from the summer heat. The cook filled their granite cups with hot tea from a granite pitcher, and when the cups were empty filled them again and again. And when the tables were partly cleared he brought out deep pies filled with raisins and with evaporated apples and a thick cake from which the men cut hunks as generous as their appetite suggested. Transley had learned, what women are said to have learned long ago, that the way to a man's heart is through his stomach, and the cook had carte blanche. Not a man who ate at Transley's table but would have spilt his blood for the boss or for the honor of the gang.

The meal was nearing its end when through a window Linder's eye caught sight of a man on horseback rapidly approaching. "Visitors, Transley," he was able to say before the rider pulled up at the open door of the covered wagon.

He was such a rider as may still be seen in those last depths of the ranching country where wheels have not entirely crowded Romance off of horseback. Spare and well-knit, his figure had a suggestion of slightness which the scales would have belied. His face, keen and clean-shaven, was brown as the August hills, and above it his broad hat sat in the careless dignity affected by the gentlemen of the plains. His leather coat afforded protection from the heat of day and from the cold of night.

"Good evening, men," he said, courteously. "Don't let me disturb your meal. Afterwards perhaps I can have a word with the boss."

"That's me," said Transley, rising.

"No, don't get up," the stranger protested, but Transley insisted that he had finished, and, getting down from the wagon, led the way a little distance from the eager ears of its occupants.

"My name is Grant," said the stranger; "Dennison Grant. I am employed by Mr. Landson, who has a ranch down the valley. If I am not mistaken you are Mr. Transley."

"You are not mistaken," Transley replied.

"And I am perhaps further correct," continued Grant, "in surmising that you are here on behalf of the Y.D., and propose cutting hay in this valley?"

"Your grasp of the situation does you credit." Transley's manner was that of a man prepared to meet trouble somewhat more than half way.

"And I may further surmise," continued Grant, quite unruffled, "that Y.D. neglected to give you one or two points of information bearing upon the ownership of this land, which would doubtless have been of interest to you?"

"Suppose you dismount," said Transley. "I like to look a man in the face when I talk business to him."

"That's fair," returned Grant, swinging lightly from his horse. "I have a preference that way myself." He advanced to within arm's length of Transley and for a few moments the two men stood measuring each other. It was steel boring steel; there was not a flicker of an eyelid.

"We may as well get to business, Grant," said Transley at length. "I also can do some surmising. I surmise that you were sent here by Landson to forbid me to cut hay in this valley. On what authority he acts I neither know nor care. I take my orders from Y.D. Y.D. said cut the hay. I am going to cut it."

"You are not!"

Transley's muscles could be seen to go tense beneath his shirt.

"Who will stop me?" he demanded.

"You will be stopped."

"The mounted police?" There was contempt in his voice, but the contempt was not for the force. It was for the rancher who would appeal to the police to settle a "friendly" dispute.

"No, I don't think it will be necessary to call in the police," returned Grant, dropping back to his pleasant, casual manner. "You know Y.D., and doubtless you feel quite safe under his wing. But you don't know Landson. Neither do you know the facts of the case—the right and wrong of it. Under these handicaps you cannot reach a decision which is fair to yourself and to your men."

"Further argument is simply waste of time," Transley interrupted. "I have told you my instructions, and I have told you that I am going to carry them out. Have you had your supper?"

"Yes, thanks. All right, we won't argue any more. I'm not arguing now—I'm telling you. Y.D. has cut hay in this valley so long he thinks he owns it, and the other ranchers began to think he owned it. But Landson has been making a few inquiries. He finds that these are not public lands, but are privately owned by speculators in New York. He has contracted with the owners for the hay rights of these lands for five years, beginning with the present season. He is already cutting farther down the valley, and will be cutting here within a day or two."

"The trout ought to bite on a fine evening like this," said Transley. "I have an extra rod and some flies. Will you try a throw or two with me?"

"I would be glad to, but I must get back to camp. I hope you land a good string," and so saying Grant remounted, nodded to Transley and again to the men now scattered about the camp, and started his horse on an easy lope down the valley.

"Well, what is it to be?" said Linder, coming up with the rest of the boys. "War?"

"War if they fight," Transley replied, unconcernedly. "Y.D. said cut the hay; 'spite o' h—l an' high water,' he said. That goes."

Slowly the great orb of the sun sank until the crest of the mountains pierced its molten glory and sent it burnishing their rugged heights. In the east the plains were already wrapped in shadow. Up the valley crept the veil of night, hushing even the limitless quiet of the day. The stream babbled louder in the lowering gloom; the stamp and champing of horses grew less insistent, the cloudlets overhead faded from crimson to mauve to blue to gray.

Transley tapped the ashes from his pipe and went to bed.

CHAPTER III

"How about a ride over to the South Fork this afternoon, Zen?" said Y.D. to his daughter the following morning. "I just want to make sure them boys is hittin' the high spots. The grass is gettin' powerful dry an' you can never tell what may happen."

"You're on," the girl replied across the breakfast table. Her mother looked up sharply. She wondered if the prospect of another meeting with Transley had anything to do with Zen's alacrity.

"I had hoped you would outgrow your slang, Zen," she remonstrated gently. "Men like Mr. Transley are likely to judge your training by your speech."

"I should worry. Slang is to language what feathers are to a hat—they give it distinction, class. They lift it out of the drab commonplace."

"Still, I would not care to be dressed entirely in feathers," her mother thrust quietly.

"Good for you, Mother!" the girl exclaimed, throwing an arm about her neck and planking a firm kiss on her forehead. "That was a solar plexus. Now I'll try to be good and wear a feather only here and there. But Mr. Transley has nothing to do with it."

"The Trout Ought to Bite on a Fine Evening Like This," Said Transley.

"Of course not," said Y.D. "Still, Transley is a man with snap in him. That's why he's boss. So many of these ornery good-for-nothin's is always wishin' they was boss, but they ain't willin' to pay the price. It costs somethin' to get to the head of the herd—an' stay there."

"He seems firm on all fours," the girl agreed. "How do we travel, and when?"

"Better take a democrat, I guess," her father said. "We can throw in a tent and some bedding for you, as we'll maybe stay over a couple of nights."

"The blue sky is tent enough for me," Zen protested, "and I can surely rustle a blanket or two around the camp. Besides, I'll want a riding horse to get around with there."

"You can run him beside the democrat," said her father. "You're gettin' too big to go campin' promisc'us like when you was a kid."

"That's the penalty for growing up," Zen sighed. "All right, Dad. Say two o'clock?"

The girl spent the morning helping her mother about the house, and casting over in her mind the probable developments of the near future. She would not have confessed outwardly to even a casual interest in Transley, but inwardly she admitted that the promise of another meeting with him gave zest to the prospect. Transley was interesting. At least he was out of the commonplace. His bold directness had rather fascinated her. He had a will. Her father had always admired men with a will, and Zen shared his admiration. Then there was Linder. The fierce light of Transley's charms did not blind her to the glow of quiet capability which she saw in Linder. If one were looking for a husband, Linder had much to recommend him. He was probably less capable than Transley, but he would be easier to manage. . . . But who was looking for a husband? Not Zen. No, no, certainly not Zen.

Then there was George Drazk, whose devotions fluctuated between "that Pete-horse" and the latest female to cross his orbit. At the thought of George Drazk Zen laughed outright. She had played with him. She had made a monkey of him, and he deserved all he had got. It was not the first occasion upon which Zen had let herself drift with the tide, always sure of justifying herself and discomfiting someone by the swift, strong strokes with which, at the right moment, she reached the shore. Zen liked to think of herself as careering through life in the same way as she rode the half-broken horses of her father's range. How many such a horse had thought that the lithe body on his back was something to race with, toy with, and, when tired of that, fling precipitately to earth! And not one of those horses but had found that while he might race and toy with his rider within limitations, at the last that light body was master, and not he. . . . Yet Zen loved best the horse that raced wildest and was hardest to bring into subjection.

That was her philosophy of life so far as a girl of twenty may have a philosophy of life. It was to go on and see what would happen, supported always by a quiet confidence that in any pinch she could take care of herself. She had learned to ride and shoot, to sleep out and cook in the open, to ride the ranges after dark by instinct and the stars—she had learned these things while other girls of her age learned the rudiments of fancywork and the scales of the piano.

Her father and mother knew her disposition, loved it, and feared for it. They knew that there was never a rider so brave, so skillful, so strong but some outlaw would throw him at last. So at fourteen they sent her east to a boarding school. In two months she was back with a letter of expulsion, and the boast of having blacked the eyes of the principal's daughter.

"They couldn't teach me any more, Mother," she said. "They admitted it. So here I am."

Y.D. was plainly perplexed. "It's about time you was halter-broke," he commented, "who's goin' to do it?"

"If a girl has learned to read and think, what more can the schools do for her?" she demanded.

And Y.D., never having been to school, could not answer.

The sun was capping the Rockies with molten gold when the rancher and his daughter swung down the foothill slopes to the camp on the South Y.D. Strings of men and horses returning from the upland meadows could be seen from the hillside as they descended.

Y.D.'s sharp eyes measured the scale of operations.

"They're hittin' the high spots," he said, approvingly. "That boy Transley is a hum-dinger."

Zen made no reply.

"I say he's a hum-dinger," her father repeated.

The girl looked up with a quick flush of surprise. Y.D. was no puzzle to her, and if he went out of his way to commend Transley he had a purpose.

"Mr. Transley seems to have made a hit with you, Dad," she remarked, evasively.

"Well, I do like to see a man who's got the goods in him. I like a man that can get there, just as I like a horse that can get there. I've often wondered, Zen, what kind you'd take up with, when it came to that, an' hoped he'd be a live crittur. After I'm dead an' buried I don't want no other dead one spendin' my simoleons."

"How about Mr. Linder," said Zen, naively.

Her father looked up sharply. "Zen," he said, "you're not serious?"

Zen laughed. "I don't figure you're exactly serious, Dad, in your talk about Transley. You're just feeling out. Well—let me do a little feeling out. How about Linder?"

"Linder's all right," Y.D. replied. "Better than the average, I admit. But he's not the man Transley is. If he was, he wouldn't be workin' for Transley. You can't keep a man down, Zen, if he's got the goods in him. Linder comes up over the average, so's you can notice it, but not like Transley does."

Zen did not pursue the subject. She understood her father's philosophy very well indeed, and, to a large degree, she accepted it as her own. The only quality Y.D. took off his hat to was the ability to do things. And Y.D.'s idea of things was very concrete; it had to do with steers and land, with hay and money and men. It was by such things he measured success. And Zen was disposed to agree with him. Why not? It was the only success she knew.

In the next installment Zen arrives in Transley's camp and plays the foreman against the boss. What complications do you foresee?

Sure Enough!

"Oh, major!" called a farmer constituent, coming out to the gate. "I've got a puzzle here. The county seat newspaper came just now with part of a page doubled over and printed twice so that it can't be read. The headline over that part says, 'Governor Trickery Here Saturday,' and I can't tell whether it means last Saturday or next Saturday."

WEEKLY MENU SUGGESTIONS

When the family takes the picnic basket for a day's outing a few suggestions may be helpful. Sandwiches of various kinds with a hot pot of coffee will often be all that is needed with some fresh fruit for the finish of the meal.

SUNDAY—Breakfast: Coffee cake. Dinner: Fried chicken, green peas. Supper: Strawberry shortcake.

MONDAY — Breakfast: Griddle cakes, bacon. Dinner: Pork chops, baked potatoes. Supper: Sally Lunn.

TUESDAY—Breakfast: Buttered toast, fried ham. Dinner: Calf's liver en casserole. Supper: Lyonnaise potatoes.

WEDNESDAY — Breakfast: Omelet. Dinner: Apple sauce snow. Supper: Gingerbread.

THURSDAY—Breakfast: Waffles, maple sirup. Dinner: Ham on escalloped potatoes. Supper: Milk toast.

FRIDAY—Breakfast: Eggs and corn gems. Dinner: Codfish gravy, baked potatoes. Supper: Sweet omelet.

SATURDAY — Breakfast: Fried scrapple. Dinner: Roast of beef. Supper: Green apple sauce, sponge cake.

Sally Lunn.

Sift one quart of flour twice with a teaspoonful of baking powder. Measure one cupful of milk, two tablespoonfuls of butter, melted, four eggs beaten light and a teaspoonful of salt. Add the sifted flour in small quantities, stirring as long as the stiffening dough will allow you to use the spoon. It should be very soft, more like batter. Bake in a funnel cake pan. Turn out when tested with a long straw or toothpick. Slice and eat while hot.

Calf's Liver en Casserole.

Cook a few slices of bacon in a frying pan; slice the liver and lay upon the hot bacon, cook two minutes on each side. Transfer to the casserole, add a pint of stock, sliced onion browned in bacon fat, and two teaspoonfuls of lemon juice. Cook closely covered for two hours. Shortly before serving add potato balls which have been parboiled. Thicken the brown gravy and serve from the casserole.

Charles Kingsley says: "Thank God every morning when you get up that you have something to do that day which must be done whether you like it or not. Being forced to work, and forced to do your best, will breed in you a hundred virtues which the idle never know."

LET'S GO PICNICKING

It is wise if one has the inviting of the party to choose those who have proven their right to belong to a picnic group. Those who find the discomforts and inconveniences so pronounced that the joy of the outing is lessened for others, should be left at home. Pick your friends from those who love the out of doors.

The food and dishes for a picnic must be planned carefully as to bulk and weight. With the paper dishes to be bought so cheaply it is not necessary to carry much weight in utensils. If one wishes a set more durable the aluminum is light in weight and agreeable to use. The fewer dishes of the washable kind the better.

Food may be wrapped in waxed paper and paper napkins used so that, with the paper utensils, the cutlery is about all that has much weight. And there are paper spoons, knives and forks if one wishes them.

After a meal is over the paper and waste may be burned, leaving nothing to carry home, compared to the old method of packing baskets with heavy crockery. Salads may be carried in ice cream containers, stuffed egg wrapped in paper squares, twisted at the ends after wrapping, and the paper may be fringed if one cares to take the trouble, making a very dainty as well as useful covering for the eggs.

Sandwiches, of course, are the mainstay. Wrapped in wax paper, they will keep moist some time.

Baked beans, creamed peas, which may be reheated, are always enjoyed at a picnic.

When a fire is built to cook steaks or hamburger, a piece of sheet iron placed on a support makes a good frying pan. All sorts of cooking may be done on it. Coffee in the pot may be cooked over it, while the coals and ashes underneath are cooking other foods.

Egg and Potato Salad.—Take two cupfuls of boiled potatoes cut in cubes, one cupful of cucumber, cut in small pieces, two or three hard-cooked eggs chopped fine, two tablespoonfuls of chopped pickle, two tablespoonfuls of chopped green or red pepper, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, a few drops of onion juice, one cupful of cooked dressing. Mix all together and carry in a glass jar.

A few drops of glycerin added to chocolate when dipping candies will give them a fine gloss.

The Shouting Fish

A new species of fish that is brilliantly illuminated and that makes a loud shouting noise when chasing smaller fishes has been discovered in the waters of Monterey bay, Cal., according to Dr. C. W. Greene of the University of Missouri. Its ability to shout, says Popular Mechanics Magazine, is due to the peculiar construction of its swim bladder, he says. The noise is produced by gaseous contents of the bladder.

The fish is said to carry 350 phosphorescent lights.

SUBSCRIPTION, the year $1.50

Entered at the Columbiana, Ala., Postoffice as second class mail, under act of Congress of March, 3rd, 1879.

People of Arab are Community Builders—

Did you ever hear of Arab? Well Arab is a village on top of Sand (Brindlee) Mountain, about 20 miles from the railroad, that in 1920 had a population of 264. The only natural source of wealth of which Arab can boast in the loose sandy soil, such as is found everywhere on Sand Mountain. There is another asset of the Arab community, the people. They are industrious and thrifty and they believe in using all the means at their command to build their community and make it a better place in which to live.

A few years ago a bank was established at Arab, one of the few banks to be located in a town off the railroad. The last statement of the Bnak of Arab, June 30, 1924, showed total resources over $136,000, loans over $100,000; total deposits over $100,000 with not a dollar borrowed.

A little later the people built a large consolidated schoo, and included in their faculty is a teacher of vocational agriculture. Next year the school will have the services of a teacher of vocational home economic.

Soon after Marshall county secured the services of an all-time health officer, the town council of Arab adopted an ordinance requiring all homes and other places where people congregrate to be provided with sanitary toilets of the pit type, a septic tank, or such other safe disposal as the county health officer might prescribe. The Arab correspondent, writing to the county paper of this action by the town council, said, "This is one of the most progressive moves that a community could make, because with the safe disposal of human excreta you eliminate typhoid fever, hook-worm and other filth borne diseases," He added, 'We all know that the old filthy, disease-breeding, open surface toilet no longer meets the requirements of modern civilization.

In the same issue of the county paper was a communication from Arab giving an account of the second banquet held by the Methodist Brotherhood of Arab with 40 members present. One of the topics for discussion was the "Health of Public School Pupils," and the speaker brought out the fact that the pupils of the Arab school had been given recently an examination for physical defects.

The experience of Arab furnishes proof of the fact that if a community is really alive it will find the means for growth and development.

Farm Bureau Meeting Is Important.

Every farmer who wants to see better farming conditions in Shelby county should come to Columbiana on Saturday, August 9th to attend the annual meeting of the Shelby County Farm Bureau.

Our one hope of seeing farm conditions improved is in the organized co-operative effort of the farmers themselves. It is right difficult at times for men who have been working independently all the years to learn to work together in a co-operative way.

At this meeting these things will be discussed by men who have been leading in the Farm Bureau movement since it was begun in this state and they will be able to give definite information as to the progress that has been made and the difficulties that are yet in the way that must be removed.

This is also the day for the election of new officers and it is with the Farm Bureau as with other organizations, its chances for success depend in large measure on the character of the men chosen to direct it.

There is no bigger problem before the people of Shelby county today than that of finding out how to improve farming conditions. The Farm Bureua, having set itself to the solution of this problem, becomes the biggest and most important organization in the county.

Let every man who belongs to the Farm Bureau realize that he is a part of a big movement; let him learn to respect it as such and to feel proud that he does belong. Then he will be in the right attitude to bring in his neighbor who is staying out because he has never understood the plans and purposes of this great organization.

The time has come for us in Shelby county to wake up and begin to do big things in a big way. Let's make the start by giving one hundred per cent loyalty and support to the Farm Bureau.

Found Strength by Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Kankakee, Illinois.—"My mother-in-law always took your medicine for weakness, and then in the Change of Life it did her so much good that she induced me to take it for a weakness I had for a year and a half. It has strengthened me and now I have a nice baby boy. I do all my own housework now, and I recommend Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound whenever I have the opportunity. I am taking it again for weakness, as my family doctor has recommended it for this purpose."—Mrs. HARRY COULOM, 964 N. Harrison Ave., Kankakee, Illinois.

WHAT IS INSULIN?

DIABETES is a disease characterized by the presence of sugar in the urine. It has been known for thousands of years.

Formerly regarded as a disease of the kidneys, it was found, about forty years ago, to be due to degeneration of the pancreas, following some infection, such as influenza or typhoid fever. It may be caused by obesity.

In 1890, Langerhans found that only a part of the gland was destroyed in diabetics and that the pancreas was really two glands in one.

One gland secretes the pancreatic juice, which goes into the small intestine and aids digestion. The other gland manufactures a substance which is taken up by the blood and which is necessary for sugar digestion.

The parts of the gland which secrete this second substance are called the islands of Langerhans.

If these islands degenerate, then the sugar in the food, instead of being used by the body, is discharged through the kidneys. So that, no matter how much the patient eats, he is unable to get enough nourishment, because much of his food is thrown away.

Diabetic patients have enormous appetites, but the more they eat the more poorly nourished they are. To make matters worse, the changed chemistry of the body produces an acid condition of the blood called acidosis, which eventually poisons the patient.

He becomes unconscious—what is known as diabetic coma—and usually never awakens.

In 1921, Dr. F. G. Banting, a young Canadian physician, determined to find this mysterious substance, the absence of which caused diabetes.

After many experiments he succeeded in making a serum containing the secretion of the Islands of Langerhans, which he called insulin.

It is now made from the pancreas of the hog, which contains more insulin than that of any other animal.

Before the discovery of insulin the only thing the doctor could do for diabetics was to give them a starch and sugar-free diet.

Since Doctor Banting's discovery it is possible to restore the diabetic patient to practically normal condition.

The doctor weighs the patient's food, estimates the amount of sugar eaten and the amount of sugar excreted.

Then he gives the patient enough insulin to digest the sugar taken into the body. This enables the body to absorb it.

Insulin is not a cure for diabetes. It replaces the missing substance in the blood of the diabetic patient and so enables him to lead a normal life.

It is not a substitute for other methods of treatment. Careful diet and ways of living are still necessary.

It is possible that its continued use may restore the pancreas to normal, at least in mild cases, but this we do not know, as yet.

GOOD FOOD SURPASSES DRUGS

NEW YORK city spends thirty-five million dollars each year maintaining its hospitals. Of this amount, ten millions, or nearly one-third, are spent for food.

This is quite different from the old idea of a hospital. People used to think they went to a hospital to take medicine. They know better now. A hospital is a place for making sick people well, not for dosing them unnecessarily.

A hundred years ago doctors didn't know what caused diseases or how they could be prevented, so the only thing they could do was to give such medicines as they had, in the hope of restoring the patient to health. The wise doctor today doesn't give any medicine unless he knows that it's going to help the patient. Of course, this means that what medicine is given today is much more necessary and beneficial than the larger quantities that used to be administered. Doctors give fewer drugs today because they know more than their predecessors did. Hospitals spend more money for food than they do for medicines, because they know that every patient needs to be properly nourished, while comparatively few need drugs.

With our better knowledge of the chemistry of foods and the processes of digestion we are able to combine feeding and medication in a way that the old-time doctor never thought of. A certain amount of iron is necessary for health. If you must have it in a hurry your doctor gives you a prescription containing iron, which will rapidly increase the amount of iron in your blood. But he would rather give it to you in a natural way through your food. The iron you get in fresh vegetables and fruits is better suited for your bodily needs than the iron you get in pills and in bottles.

So the doctor today gives his patients, either at home or in the hospital, many needful substances in their food which he formerly had to give in the form of medicines. When he does give medicine, he gives it because it is necessary and he gives the smallest amount that will do the work.

Every capable physician knows today that it is just as important for his patient to have the right kind of food as the right kind of medicine.

BACK ACHY?

Lame and achy in the morning? Tortured with backache all day long? No wonder you feel worn out and discouraged! But have you given any thought to your kidneys? Weak kidneys cause just such troubles; and you are likely to have headaches, too, with dizziness, stabbing pains and other kidney irregularities. Don't risk neglect! Use Doan's Pills, a stimulant diuretic to the kidneys. Doan's have helped thousands. They should help you. Ask your neighbor!

An Alabama Case

Mrs. Mary Buchanan, West End, Scottsboro, Ala., says: "My back was weak and I couldn't stoop on account of knife-like pains. When I sat down and then tried to get up the pains became more severe. My kidneys acted irregularly; sometimes too freely, and again they were sluggish. I purchased Doan's Pills and after taking them I was relieved of the trouble."

New Use of Concrete as Building Material

Raised biscuits of concrete, as light as those "mother used to make" and much more durable, are now a possibility. They will float, but are not intended to be eaten. They are used as building material, their porous structure making them light and easy to handle, and also resistant to the transmission of heat. They are the invention of Axel Eriksson, a Swedish architect, as reported in a recent issue of the Engineering News-Record. These concrete blocks are "raised" through the addition to the mixture, while still wet, of a quantity of finely-powdered zinc or aluminum. This reacts with the free lime of the cement, liberating hydrogen gas, which fills the liquid mixture with bubbles of the gas that are imprisoned there when the concrete sets. The process is analogous to that of the leavening of dough, which is accomplished by the setting free of carbon dioxide from a mixture of bicarbonate of soda and cream of tartar, alum, or some other chemical. The building authorities of Stockholm have approved the use of these blocks in two-story buildings.

Those who undertake to read the character of persons with whom they come in contact can no longer rely on what the eyebrow says to them. The plucking of eyebrows has become so careful that they cannot be made to betray anything of the makeup of their wearers. Character readers must fall back on the contour of the nose, curves of the mouth and the "crow's feet" about the eyes to form their conclusions and must remove the eyebrows entirely from their observations.

To make a living by knowing about books, one has to know tons and tons of information about them.

WOMEN NEED SWAMP-ROOT

Thousands of women have kidney and bladder trouble and never suspect it.

Women's complaints often prove to be nothing else but kidney trouble, or the result of kidney or bladder disease.

If the kidneys are not in a healthy condition they may cause the other organs to become diseased.

Pain in the back, headache, loss of ambition, nervousness are oftentimes symptoms of kidney trouble.

Don't delay starting treatment. Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, a physician's prescription, obtained at any drug store, may be just the remedy needed to overcome such conditions.

Get a medium or large size bottle immediately from any drug store.

However, if you wish first to test this great preparation, send ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a sample bottle. When writing, be sure and mention this paper.—Advertisement.

Here are four reasons why BRO-ASPRIN is being used more and more by people who formerly used plain aspirin, as well as by those who were unable to take aspirin of any kind.

1. BRO-ASPRIN helps remove the cause of colds, fever, headaches and la grippe, at the same time giving immediate relief.
2. BRO-ASPRIN hasn't the unpleasant after effects of plain aspirin. The mild vegetable laxative eliminates the aspirin after relief has been given.
3. BRO-ASPRIN keeps the pores of the skin closed. Many remedies open them, increasing the likelihood of the patient developing a severe cold or pneumonia.
4. BRO-ASPRIN is free from all habit-forming or dangerous drugs.

On the Isle of Georgia

Inhabitants of the Isle of Georgia.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

South Georgia, due east of Cape Horn in the South Atlantic ocean, is the typical outpost of the Antarctic as Iceland is of the Arctic, but it is a much smaller island than the latter and lacking its tempering Gulf stream, has never been possible of colonization. But if it has no extensive history of its own, it has a place in the history of geographic discovery, for it was the first South Polar land known to man and was found during the golden age of exploration. And it later came to be an El Dorado of seal skins for brave Yankee skippers.

Until the latter part of the Eighteenth century, maps of the world commonly included a conjectured landmass lying south of the known continents and labeled Terra Australis Incognita. From time to time since the discovery of America, vague reports of southern land had been brought to Europe by mariners who had been blown southward out of their course, and contemporary geographers had held persistent hopes for the discovery and exploitation of an austral continent which might add a second New World to the globe.

In 1775, Capt. James Cook, commander of H. M. S. Resolution on a voyage in search of this terra incognita, was cruising along the coast of an ice-covered island in latitude 54 degrees 30 minutes south. The isle had appeared unexpectedly in the path of the Resolution, and it was the first assurance of the disappointment in store for mankind.

The discoverer was somewhat depressed on seeing the barrenness of the new land, whose rocky shore and cliffs of ice were but gloomy auguries for a habitable territory lying still nearer the Southern pole.

The Isle of Georgia.

Referring to his blighted hope of a fair Antarctic land, he said: "To judge of the bulk by the sample, it would not be worth the discovery. . . . Who would have thought that an island of no greater extent than this, situated between the latitude of 54 degrees and 55 degrees, should, in the very height of summer, be in a manner wholly covered, many fathoms deep, with frozen snow?"

Cook took possession of the country for England and named it the Isle of Georgia; and, after charting the coast, he proceeded on his famous circumnavigation of the world.

South Georgia, as the island came to be called, was destined not to be forgotten, for the brave tales of Captain Cook were popular reading during the early years of American independence. It may be that his word "sea-bears" was the lure that started the first follower in the wake of the Resolution. Certain it is that before the close of the Eighteenth century bold Yankee mariners from New London, Stonington, and other Long Island sound ports had begun to reap the harvest of fur-seals skins at South Georgia.

When the supply of lucrative fur-seals first began to fail, the other amphibious monsters mentioned by Cook, the sea-elephants, were forced to pay the costs of the ruthless voyagers. The sea-elephant is the largest of seals, and is thickly invested with blubber which yields an oil little inferior to the product of the sperm whale; hence, "elephant hunting" became an important industry at most of the subantarctic islands. In many of its haunts the species was soon exterminated, and, although at South Georgia it still persists, its days are numbered unless absolute protection be soon enforced.

But the tale of human industry at the barren isle is not yet told, and the latest development already overshadows a century of sealing. Eighteen years ago Norwegian seafarers, Vikings still, found a field unspoiled by the bloody dynasty of their American predecessors, and they have made South Georgia the headquarters of the greatest whale fishery on earth.

Between 1910 and 1920 more than 40,000 whales, representing a value of roughly fifty millions of dollars, have been shot on the offshore banks and towed to the bustling whaling stations of the island. In a single year (season of 1915-1916) the South Georgian catch numbered 5,510 whales.

Glaciers Are Mighty.

Small though South Georgia is, its glaciers are as mighty as those of Spitzbergen, and there is ample evidence that the island was formerly completely buried by an ice-cap. The high ground of the interior is covered with an everlasting neve, which consolidates at the sources of all the valleys to form tongues of ice, most of which extend clear into the sea, ending in abrupt walls.

The one incomprehensible statement in Captain Cook's account of South Georgia is his emphatic testimony that he saw no brook or stream along the whole coast. Certainly today the rushing torrents are a great impediment to progress on land, and during January thaws gleaming cascades, visible from far at sea, pour from the ledges of the coast hills.

The climate of South Georgia varies relatively little throughout the year. The mean annual temperature is very close to the freezing point, and the sky is prevailingly overclouded. February is the warmest month. Snow, generally in the form of hard, globular particles, which sting the skin like hail, falls in every month, and rain and sleet storms are both frequent and prolonged during the summer. Either rain or snow falls on about five-sixths of the days of the whole year.

The greatest proportion of clear days is in winter; but November and December, the springtime of the southern world, are often made memorable by a few successive days of sunshine, while on rare midsummer afternoons of January and February the jealous Ice King is sometimes lulled to sleep, the thermometer rises as high as 68 degrees Fahrenheit, and South Georgia basks in a sparkling calm. Only on such fleeting occasions is the subtle feeling of the glaciers absent from the land and sea.

Has Oceanic Climate.

South Georgia has an oceanic, as opposed to a continental, climate; it is under the continual equalizing influence of the sea, and it thoroughly demonstrates how much more unfavorable to the production of a varied flora is a constantly low temperature than seasonal cold of the severest kind.

Owing to the same oceanic life conditions, the land animals of South Georgia are even fewer than the plants. There is no indigenous terrestrial mammal, but rats, horses and reindeer have been introduced and are thriving in a wild state. The rats were probably first brought by sealing vessels a hundred years ago.

Most remarkable of all the living things of South Georgia, perhaps, are the great clumsy sea elephants. They have contentious dispositions and are given to fighting among themselves from earliest puphood, yet fondness for company is one of their marked traits. An animal coming out of the sea is obviously not contented on a lonely shore. It wanders about nervously between brief resting periods and soon returns to the water, perhaps feeling that it must find some one to quarrel with.

A sea-elephant, when landing, crawls slowly up the strand, stopping to let the waves break over it and taking advantage of every swell to aid its progress. When it has reached the upper beach it rises to its full height and reconnoiters; then, proceeding a little farther, it repeats the action; or, if it spies none of its kind, it may take a siesta before continuing the search.

The two dozen species of birds which breed on South Georgia offer a fascinating field for the study of certain biological questions, notably the struggle for existence. Of special interest are the penguins. Two species are still common at South Georgia.

The nobler tribe of penguins, the "kings," form a sort of hereditary aristocracy. They are stalwart birds which stand a yard high. They wear a gold collar round their necks, and deport themselves in a rather lofty and snobbish manner.

A band of king penguins makes a glorious display when the morning sunlight shines on the golden throats and orange ear-patches of the soldierly birds. Sometimes the brigades scattered here and there over the beaches and moraines, hail and answer each other with long-drawn, martial, bugle calls, and then, as if at a concerted signal, all will start marching toward the sea. Sometimes the birds stand together on the sunny side of a snowdrift, preening their feathers, "marking time," or even performing the difficult stunt of balancing themselves on one foot and scratching their heads with the other.

How To Save Time In The Kitchen

THERE'S no reason why you should spend needless time and energy in the kitchen fretting with the cooking when you can prepare so easily the many delicious dishes with self-rising flour. It affords a new way to make tasteful and appetizing the old familiar foods every one loves so well. Biscuits, hot muffins, cakes and dainty pastries, all rise better and have a more tempting flavor when made with self-rising flour.

"I consider self-rising flour one of my oldest friends," writes a noted Southern cook. "I would not be without it. . . . When I'm in hurry I know that with a hot oven and plenty of self-rising flour everything will be all right."

As in plain flour, self-rising comes in a number of different grades. Your grocer will sell you exactly the same grade of self-rising that you have been using in plain flour. See that the Blue Shield of the Soft Wheat Millers' Association is on every bag you buy. It means that you are getting guaranteed flour. Accept no other.

FOLLOW THESE FIVE RULES For Making Perfect Biscuits with Self-Rising Flour. (1) See that your oven is hot; (2) Always use sweet milk or cold water; (3) Never add baking powder, soda or salt; (4) Use good shortening—lard, vegetable fat or butter; (5) Make soft dough—bake quickly. Gas

Forty years ago, kerosene was the main by-product of crude oil. Around refineries, men drew off a barrel of gasoline to wash a pair of overalls, and dumped it out. Then came the auto.

This year, refiners say, 9,177,000,000 gallons of gasoline will be produced in the United States. This will be a fifth more than in 1923. How long, at this rate of increase, until the underground oil reserves will be exhausted?

The future fuel, and probably within your lifetime, will be alcohol or electricity sent by radio from central stations.

ASTHMA AND HAY FEVER A GUARANTEED RELIEF

"I have arranged with all druggists here, as well as in all other towns of the U. S., that every sufferer from Asthma, Hay Fever, Bronchial Asthma or difficult breathing can try my treatment entirely at my risk," Dr. R. Schiffmann announces. He says: "Buy a package of my Asthmador, or cigarettes, try it, and if it does not afford you immediate relief, or if you do not find it the best remedy you have ever used, take it back to your druggist and he will return your money cheerfully, and without any question whatever. After seeing the grateful relief it has afforded in hundreds of cases, which had been considered incurable, and which had been given up in despair, I know what it will do. I am so sure that it will do the same with others that I am not afraid to guarantee it will relieve instantaneously. Certainly more positive proof can thus be demonstrated than a 'free sample' could possibly prove. Also sent on same guarantee, per parcel post, C. O. D., or on receipt of price, 65c, if not kept by your druggist, by addressing R. Schiffmann Co., 1734 N. Main, Los Angeles, Calif."—Adv.

FARM BUREAU HOLDS ENTHUSIASTIC MEET

The third annual convention of the State Farm Bureau Federation held in Montgomery last week, was in every way the best meeting the organization ever held, according to P. M. Henderson, secretary of the local Farm Bureau, who with County Agent A. A Lauderdale, represented Shelby county in the convention.

Every county that had a Farm Bureau organization, sixty-three in number, was represented at the convention, some counties having as many as seven delegates. The meetings were full of enthusiasm throughout. The best reports the organization has ever heard were submitted by the officers in charge of the various activities. These reports showed that while the business of the Farm Bureau had greatly increased in volume during the past year, running expenses had been reduced over $300 a month.

While in Montgomery the delegates were invited to go through the offices of the Farm Bureau, where a great deal of the detail work was explained. Delegates expressed themselves as well pleased with the showing made and declared that they would in the future give even more enthusiastic support to their organization than they had been doing before.

Full and detailed reports of the work of the Farm Bureau Cotton Association were made which showed this division of the association to have been successful in its work. Equally satisfactory reports were made of fertilizer sales that reached large proportions and that made a direct saving to the farmers of the state of not less than half a million dollars.

Officers for the coming year were elected without friction and plans made for the new year with greater enthusiasm than the leaders have ever seen before.

Mr. Henderson says that in his opinion, if all the farmers of Shelby county could have attended the convention, and could have heard the reports and could have seen as he saw, so many evidences of sound constructive work being done by farmers themselves in their great organization, there would be such an increase in the membership of the Shelby county Farm Bureau as would make it the strongest and most active organization the county has ever had.

Wesley Ozley of Siluria was a visitor to Columbiana Saturday.

BAD TREATMENT CHARGES DENIED

CONVICT BOARD RECEIVES REPORT FROM DR. BLAIR ON CONDITIONS AT CONVICT CAMP AT RIVER FALLS.

Montgomery.—The letter charging brutal treatment of convicts at River Falls prison was branded as false by Dr. F. F. Blair, physician inspector of the state convict department, in a report submitted to the board of administration and transmitted to the governor. Governor Brandon, who had said that an investigation would be made of the report of mistreatment of convicts at River Falls, stated after receipt of Dr. Blair's report that no further investigation was contemplated.

The complaint from prisoners at River Falls was printed in a letter from them in a Montgomery newspaper, the letter charging that prisoners were beaten with sticks and straps, confined in a "hot house" all night and worked the following day, and that they were not receiving adequate food and medical attention.

Dr. Blair's letter on conditions at River Falls received by the state board of administration, stated:

"On my regular monthly trip to River Falls I found the hospital empty and no one sick. We have had very little sickness at River Falls for the past month.

"Mr. Crawford has just completed remodeling the white cells, and it helps the looks of the prison as well as comfort for the men.

"The menu for supper was as follows: String beans and pork meat, fried okra, boiled Irish potatoes, corn bread, Georgia cane syrup and light bread. For breakfast they had Georgia cane syrup, hot biscuit, rice, fried ham and gravy.

"Mr. Crawford has a super-abundance of vegetables on hand and his garden has been extra fine.

"The article which appeared in one of the afternoon papers is false. The men who wrote this article are the same ones that we moved from Kilby prison after the publication of a similar letter. You remember, we were forced to move these men from Kilby on account of the other prisoners resenting the publication of that article. If a similar condition arises at River Falls, I guess we will have to ship them again.

"Very truly yours,

"F. F. BLAIR,

"Physician Inspector."

That Jasper is growing rapidly is proven by the 1924 school census as well as an actual census of the town taken in connection with the school census. While not official the census of the entire population of Jasper, taken by the school census enumerators on separate books is accurate. While taking the school census Prof. Jones and his assistant have enumerated the number of people in each house visited within the city limits of Jasper, and have found that the present population of Jasper is 4,483 as compared with 3,246, as reported by the United States census of 1920, a gain of 1,237 since 1920.

Timbales of Corn and Pimento.

Remove the seeds from a half dozen sweet red peppers and parboil until tender. Rub through a colander and mix with a pint of sifted corn, two tablespoonfuls of heavy cream, one teaspoonful of tomato sauce, the yolks of three eggs, well beaten, and seasoning to taste. Fold in the stiffly beaten whites of the eggs and pour into well-greased timbale cups and cook for half an hour set in hot water in a moderate oven. Turn out on a hot platter and serve with hollandaise sauce.

Caramel Custard.

Melt one-half cupful of sugar in a smooth iron frying pan until it is a rich brown in color. Heat custard cups very hot, then pour in the caramel, coating the sides of the cups well. Prepare a custard as usual for baking using a pint of milk to two eggs. Add two tablespoonfuls of sugar as the caramel will add some sweetness to the dish. Set in a pan of hot water and bake until firm.

Maple Cake Filling.

Prepare the usual layer cake and use the following: One cupful of maple sirup, one-third of a cupful of sour cream. Cook until waxy, add nuts and beat until cool before spreading on the cake.

SAVORY FOODS

A cupful or two of chicken gravy poured over buttered toast and served with a crisp lettuce salad and a cup of hot cocoa makes a good luncheon.

Fillet of Beef With Vegetables.—Wipe a three-pound fillet of beef and brown it in a hot frying pan in butter. When the entire surface is well seared cook more slowly for half an hour. Remove to a hot serving dish and garnish with a cupful each of seasoned carrots and peas and a cupful of fresh mushrooms that have been cooked in butter five minutes. Serve with:

Mushroom Sauce.—Cook the stems of the mushrooms in cold water to cover until all the flavor is removed; chop the mushrooms with one cupful of caps; season well and cook in butter for a few minutes. To the mushroom liquor add a cupful of chicken stock; thicken with three tablespoonfuls of flour cooked with two tablespoonfuls of butter and add the mushrooms.

Swedish Cabbage.—Boil until tender a dozen large leaves of cabbage. Drain and fill with the following: Chop a pound of round steak; add salt, pepper, parsley, a clove of garlic, a tablespoonful or two of cream and three tablespoonfuls of bread crumbs. Roll the leaves around a spoonful of the mixture; tie and drop into a pint of soup stock. Place in a hot oven and baste often while cooking. The garlic may be placed in the stock or used to rub the pan if the flavor is not well-liked. Remove the strings before serving.

Poppy Seed Salad.—Grate a little sage cheese over fresh head lettuce; sprinkle with freshly-roasted poppy seed and serve with French dressing.

Frozen Cheese With Figs.—Mash two good-sized cream cheeses and beat in one-half cupful of whipped cream, sweeten to taste and pack in baking powder cans and put into ice and salt. When serving cut into slices; make a depression in the center and drop in a rich preserved fig with the stem end up.

Peach Betty.—Use soft crumbs from the center of a loaf, mix three cupfuls of the crumbs with one-half cupful of melted butter. Put a layer of crumbs into a baking dish and lay over them a layer of sliced peaches; sprinkle with sugar, orange or lemon peel and bake one hour. Cover the dish while baking the first half hour, then remove and brown. Serve hot with cream and sugar.

Turn to Long Tunic Frocks; Smart Sportswear Modes

THE tunic is the theme paramount in fashion's realm just now. Long, longer, longest marks the way of these new tunics. Most of them begin at the neck and never stop until they reach within a few inches of the skirt hem. Some of these below-the-knee blouses, if one may consider them so, are very straight-lined, indeed, suffering not even a belt or girdle to interrupt their course toward the lower edge of the skirt over which they are posed. Others are more lenient, shirring in just a little at the neck, fastening stylishly down one side and permitting a graceful long tasseled girdle, just as the model in the picture shows. However, when it comes to length, please observe there is no compromise, for the trend is decidedly toward an era of long tunics. This very genteel afternoon frock of our illustration is fashioned of rust-colored flat crepe, bordered with squares cut from deep rosewood-toned velvet.

Genteel Afternoon Frock.

Many of the tunic dresses for fall show a heavily-patterned border around the lower edge, done in ornate embroidery, or, as in the case of an exclusive model in Lanvin green, hand-painted in bold floral design.

Among the practical long tunic modes those of black satin are interestingly featured with trimmings of white. The unbelted idea is carried out, with a long front opening at the neck, faced with white, working into a turnover collar at the back. White crepe necktie, whose streamer ends are knotted and then let flow to the lower edge of the tunic, is an imposing style-touch. The sleeves reveal a white facing, for the mode for black-and-white is confirmed in advance fall dress collections.

Capelets inset at the back lend distinctive style to these slenderized tunic silhouettes in some instances. The newest capelet attachment is split up the back, so as to show either a white or vivid lining. Fine plaitings below the waist depth are also used in the manner of a capelet in the latest long-tunic frocks.

Not infrequently the skirt contrasts the long tunic. However, its relationship to it is proved in that collars, cuffs, revers and other accessory trimmings are of the same material as the underskirt, itself merely showing as a border as it drops below the tunic. Printed cotton tunics, gay of color or in black-and-white, are stylish for summer, posed over skirts of solid color.

Comfort-insuring and style-appealing are the handsome jersey-knit suits and separate jersey jackets which feature so prominently among this season's sportswear. What more timely for late summer and early fall than a jersey-knit sleeveless costume such as is shown to the left in this picture? Or for an informal riding jaunt could one find a more appealing jacket mode than one of jersey-knit such as is worn by the fair equestrienne standing to the right?

Here is an interesting bit of information in regard to the modish knitted jersey togs pictured herewith—they are bright red! Which means that the outstanding popular color combination in sportswear circles is vivid red with white. The smartest bathing suits are white jersey-knit with red stripe border and interknit with red monogram, or vice versa, the body of the suit being gay red.

At a glance a practical mind senses the advantage of a two-piece jersey suit, which has, as the picture shows, a perfectly plain skirt, which serves admirably with or without its matching jacket. As to the sleeveless jacket, it not only completes a perfect ensemble with its skirt of self-material, but considered separately, it offers many possibilities. Would it not be charming over a plaited white crepe sports skirt? As a smart and practical adjunct to the riding costume, its adaptability is demonstrated in the accompanying illustration.

Sleeveless Jersey Knit Models.

The scope of knitted sportswear is broadening. As travel costume, tourists prefer the knitted kind for many reasons. There is the advantage of small space occupied in packing, the immeasurable satisfaction in the fact that knitted clothes shake out sans wrinkles and creases, and the list of virtues is crowned with the decided effectiveness in color and design displayed throughout knitted costuming.

The fall knitted modes promise a handsome showing of plaids.

KANSAS SPIRIT

In Chicago there is an informal organization known as the Midland Authors. Its members are people who write and live in the Middle West. Some are famous folk, most are not. Nearly all of them are proud of the fact that they have stuck to the country they know and love and have not let the whirlpool of publishing interests in New York suck them in.

There's one independent state where the native writers aren't content to depend on membership in an organization out of their own confines. The Kansas Authors' club has an interesting letterhead and an active organization all its own. The president lives in Manhattan, but it's Manhattan, Kan.

The vice president has created a most interesting life under conditions that some women would have fretted themselves ill over. She was a city girl with plenty of money. Just when she had finished high school and was ready to study for the stage her father lost all his money. That was in Chicago. Her secondary ambition was to write. So she wrote for the living that had to be made, but it was other folks' letters that she indited. Gradually she climbed up the ladder until she was head of the correspondence department of a great mail order house. In order to appreciate the height of that ladder, remember that on the catalogue and letters of a mail order store depend all the business that other stores pay salesmen up to $20,000 salaries for.

Then, as Mrs. James Patrick, she happily gave up the business career to move to a little Kansas village. There was no railroad within 30 miles of the "Gables," as the Patricks named the rooftree that grew to be a charming ranch house adjoining the village. Then the railroad came through—not far south that the county seat moved down to, the steel rails, and the Patricks followed, to make a new home at a new town, Satanta.

Meanwhile Mae Patrick had caught the spirit of enjoying "the real things of life, friendship, love, the simple things, the brilliant minds, of which there are many in a small community, the poor and the wealthy, all the real people that one comes face to face with in the small place." She's volunteered on many civic jobs, she's served on the Republican state executive board, she's worked on the committee appointed recently by Secretary Work to investigate Indian affairs. And always, she's kept to writing for she's love of it. Just now, she says, she's putting together a series of sketches of "the real people of the great Southwest."

HAVE YOU AN ACRE OF DIAMONDS?

There's only one section of this country—or of any other—where "Miss Millie" would be a title of love and honor and distinction. Miss Millie Mildred Lewis Rutherford undoubtedly was when, as a little girl, she pored over lessons at a beautiful solid mahogany school desk. Miss Millie still was at eighteen, when the world began to open before her, especially the glorious world of art and travel that the "Old South" liked to give its girls. And Miss Millie she still is, to an even wider and more appreciative group when, as president of the Lucy Cobb Institute of Athens, Ga., she guides other girls at the same precious old mahogany desks of her own girlhood.

It's been a life, she insists, lacking in the dramatic qualities that would make other girls want to read about hers. But is it so commonplace to be able to see value in the very things that have been familiar through all the years? Not only to see that value, but to preserve it, to make it yield a living to oneself and a service to many others?

This is the essence of Miss Millie's achievement. Not long ago some of the hard-headed members of the Athens Chamber of Commerce went out to see whether there was really anything much out there at the old school. They found "big double reception parlors furnished elegantly, but more like a comfortable home than the formal entry of an educational institution. They found the "George I. Seney collection of oils and water colors," pictures "of the old Cobb home, and of Lucy Cobb herself, rescued from the home of a family of erstwhile Cobb servants," historic furniture with legends of some of the best of southern culture adding to its luster, together with "model apartments for teachers' quarters and bathrooms everywhere," that appealed to their manly souls.

So they went back to their office. And they picked out the member who had the gift of gab and asked him to write up what they'd seen.

He started his story with the [illegible] of the Chautauqua lecture on "Acres of Diamonds." Remember it? [illegible] farmer who sold out and went in search for gold, while the wise man who bought the farm found [illegible] mond mine when he scratched the worn hillsides.

Linder, foreman, is substantial, but not self-assertive. George Drask, one of the men, is an irresponsible chap who proposes to every woman he meets. Y.D. instructs Transley to cut the South Y.D., "spite o' h—l an' high water" and a fellow named Landson. Drask proposes to Zen and is neatly rebuffed. Transley pitches camp on the South Y.D. and finds Landson's outfit cutting hay. Dennison Grant, Landson's manager, notifies Transley that he is working under a lease from the legal owners and warns Transley off. All of which means war. Y.D. and Zen ride to the South Y.D. Zen is a natural vamp, not yet quite-broke and ripe for mating. Y.D. has taken a liking to Transley.

Transley was greeting them as they rode into camp.

"Glad to see you, Y.D.; honored to have a visit from you, ma'am," he said as he helped them from the demure, and gave instructions for the care of their horses. "Supper is waiting and the men won't be ready for some time."

Y.D. shook hands with Transley cordially. "Zen an' me just thought we'd ride over and see how the wind blew," he said. "You got a good spot here for camp, Transley. But we won't stay to supper just now. Let the horses eat first; I always say the work stock should be first at the barn. How's she goin'?"

"Fine," said Transley, "fine," but it was evident his mind was divided. He was glancing at Zen, who stood by without the conversation.

"You must try and make your daughter feel at home," he continued. "I allow you miss the luxury of a private tent, but as you will be staying over night I must ask you to accept it for her."

"Don't have my own tent with me, I'm a democrat," said Zen. "If you must let the men pitch it under the trees where I can hear the water murmuring in the night—"

"I'd have thought it, from the character of the practical Y.D.!" Transley bantered. "All right, ma'am, in the meantime take my tent. There's water, and there's a basin already was leading the horses yourself at home—Zen. May I call you Zen?" he added, in a lower voice as they left Y.D. at a distance. "Everybody calls me Zen."

They were standing at the door of the tent, he holding back the flap that she might enter. The valley was already in shadow, and there was no sunlight to play on her hair, but her slender and figure in the mellow dusk seemed entirely winsome and adorable. There was no taint of Y.D.'s millions in the admiration that Transley bent upon her. . . . Of course, as an afterthought, the millions were not to be despised.

When the men had finished supper they were summoned her. On the way to the chuck-wagon she passed close to Drazk. It was evident that he had chosen a station with that reservation. She had passed by when he groaned, whimsically.

"Oh, George, how's that Pete-horse?" she said.

"Been an' comin' all the time, Zen," he answered.

He bit her lip over his familiarity. He had no comeback. She had given him the opening, by calling him George.

"I see, I got quite well acquainted with Mr. Drazk when he came back for a horse blanket which had mysteriously disappeared," she explained to Transley.

She ascended the steps which led from the ground into the wagon. The seats had been reset for four, and as the windows were now heavy in the shadows candles had been lighted. Y.D. and his daughter sat on one side, Transley on the other. In a moment Zen entered. He had already had words with Y.D., but had not met since their supper together in the ranch house.

"I want to see you again, Mr. Linder," the girl, rising and extending her hand across the table. "You see we have time in returning your call."

Linder took her hand in a frank grip but could think of nothing in particular to say. "We're glad to see you," was all he could manage. He was rather sorry that Linder had made more of the situation. He pondered what quick repartee. Some doubt, with double meaning, he would have returned. It was just as that, as her father had said, he was second best. And yet there was something about his shyness that appealed to her even more than Transley's superb self-confidence. The meal was spent in small talk about horses and steers and the merits of different makes of mowing machines. When it was finished Transley apologized for not offering Zen any liquor. "I never keep it in the camp," he said.

"That's right," Y.D. agreed, "quite right. Booze is like fire; a valuable servant in careful hands, but mighty dangerous when everybody gets playin' with it. I reckon the grass is gettin' pretty dry, Transley?"

"Mighty dry, all right, but we're taking every precaution."

"I'm sure you are, but you can't take precautions for other people. Has anybody been puttin' you up to any trouble here?"

"Well, no, I can't exactly say trouble," said Transley, "but we've got notice it's coming. A chap named Grant, foreman, I think, for Landson, down the valley, rode over last night, and invited us not to cut any hay hereabouts. He was very courteous, and all that, but he had the manner of a man who'd go quite a distance in a pinch."

"What did you tell him?"

"Told him I was working for Y.D., and then asked him to stay for supper."

"Did he stay?" Zen asked.

"He did not. He cantered off back, courteous as he came. And this morning we went out on the job, and have cut all day, and nothing has happened."

"I guess he found you were not to be bluffed," said Zen, and Transley could not prevent a flush of pleasure at her compliment. "Of course Landson has no real claim to the hay, has he, Dad?"

"Of course not. I reckon them'll be his stacks we saw down the valley. Well, I'm not wantin' to rob him of the fruit of his labor, an' if he keeps calm perhaps we'll let him have what he has cut, but if he don't—" Y.D.'s face hardened with the set of a man accustomed to fight, and win, his own battles. "I think we'll just stick around a day of two in case he tries to start anythin'," he continued.

"Well, five o'clock comes early," said Transley, "and you folks must be tired with your long drive. We've had your tent pitched down by the water, Zen, so that its murmurs may sing you to sleep. You see, I have some of the poetic in me, too. Mr. Linder will show you down, and I will see that your father is made comfortable. And remember—five o'clock does not apply to visitors."

The camp now lay in complete darkness, save where a lantern threw its light from a tent by the river. Zen walked by Linder's side. Presently she reached out and took his arm.

"The Truth Is, Mr. Linder, You're Not Shy, You're Frightened."

"I beg your pardon," said Linder. "I should have offered—"

"Of course you should. Mr. Transley would not have waited to be told. Dad thinks that anythings that's worth having in this world is worth going after, and going after hard. I guess I'm Dad's daughter in more ways than one."

"I suppose he's right," Linder confessed, "but I've always been shy. I get along all right with men.'

"The truth is, Mr. Linder, you're not shy—you're frightened. Now I can well believe that no man could frighten you. Consequently you get along all right with men. Do I need to tell you the rest?"

"I never thought of myself as being afraid of women," he replied. "It has always seemed that they were, well, he replied, just out of my line."

They had reached the tent but the girl made no sign of going in. In the silence the sibilant lisp of the stream rose loud about them.

"Mr. Linder," she said at length, "do you know why Mr. Transley sent you down here with me?"

"I'm sure I don't except to show you to your tent."

"That was the least of his purposes. He wanted to show you that he wasn't afraid of you, and he wanted to show me that he wasn't afraid of you. Mr. Transley is a very self-confident individual. There is such a thing as being too self-confident, Mr. Linder, just as there is such a thing as being too shy. Do you get me? Good night!" And with a little rush she was in her tent.

Linder walked slowly down to the water's edge, and stood there, thinking, until Zen's light went out. His brain was in a whirl with a sensation entirely strange to it. A wind, laden with snow-smell from the mountains, pressed gently against his features, and presently Linder took deeper breaths than he had ever known before.

"By Jove!" he said. "Who'd have thought it possible?"

CHAPTER IV

When Zen awoke next morning the mowing machines of Transley's outfit were already singing their symphony in the meadows; she could hear the metallic rhythm as it came borne on the early breeze. She lay awake on her camp cot for a few minutes, stretching her fingers to the canvas ceiling and feeling that it was good to be alive. And it was. The ripple of water came from almost underneath the walls of her tent; the smell of spruce trees and balm-o'-Gilead and new-mown hay was in the air. She could feel the warmth of the sunshine already pouring upon her white roof; she could trace the gentle sway of the trees by the leafy patterns gliding forward and back. A cheeky gopher, exploring about the door of her tent, ventured in, and, sitting bolt upright, sent his shrill whistle boldly forth. She watched his fine bravery for a minute, then clapped her hands together, and laughed as he fled.

"Therein we have the figures of both Transley and Linder," she mused to herself. "Upright, Transley; horizontal, Linder. I doubt if the poor fellow slept last night after the fright I gave him."

Slowly and clamly she turned the incident over in her mind. She wondered a little if she had been quite fair with Linder. Her words and conduct were capable of very broad interpretations. She was not at all in love with Linder; of that Zen was sure. She was equally sure that she was not at all in love with Transley. She admitted that she admired Transley for his calm assumptions, but they nettled her a little nevertheless. If this should develop into a love affair—if it should—she had no intention that it was to be a pleasant afternoon's canter. It was to be a race—a race, mind you—and may the best man win! She had a feeling, amounting almost to a conviction, that Transley underrated his foreman's possibilities in such a contest. She had seen many a dark horse, less promising than Linder, gallop home with the stakes.

Then Zen smiled her own quiet, self-confident smile. The idea of either Transley or Linder thinking he could gallop home with her! For the moment she forgot to do Linder the justice of remembering that nothing was further from his thoughts. She would show them. She would make a race of it—almost to the wire. In the home stretch she would make the leap, out and over the fence. She was in it for the race, not for the finish.

Zen contemplated for some minutes the possibilities of that race; then, as the imagination threatened to become involved, she sprang from her cot and thrust a cautious head through the door of her tent. The gang had long since gone to the fields, and friendly bushes sheltered her from view from the cook car. She drew on her boots, shook out her hair, threw a towel across her shoulders, and, soap in hand, walked boldly the few steps to the stream rippling over its shiny gravel bed. She stopped and tested the water with her fingers; then brought it in fresh, cool handfuls about her face and neck.

"Mornin', Zen!" said a familiar voice. "'Scuse me for happenin' to be here. I was jus' waterin' that Pete-horse after a hard ride."

"Now look here, Mr. Drazk!" said the girl, whipping her scanty clothing about her, "if I had a gun—! I won't have you spying about!"

"Aw, don' be cross," Drazk protested. He was sitting on his horse in the ford a dozen yards away. "I jus' happened along. I guess the outside belongs to all of us. Say, Zen, if I was to get properly interduced, what's the chances?"

"Not one in a million, and if that isn't odds enough I'll double it."

"You're not goin' to hitch up with Linder, are you?"

"Linder? Who said anything about Linder?"

"Gee, but ain't she innercent?" Drazk stepped his horse up a few feet to facilitate conversation. "I alus take an interest in innercent gals away from home, so I kinda kep' my angel eye on you las' night. An' I see Linder stalkin' aroun' here an' sighin' out over the water when he should 'ave been in bed. But, of course, he's been interduced."

"George Drazk, if you speak to me again I'll horsewhip you out of the camp at noon before all the men. Now, beat it!"

"Jus, as you say, ma'am," he returned, with mock courtesy. "But you don't need to be scared. That's one thing I never do—I never squeal on a friend."

She was burning with his insults, and if she had had a gun at hand she undoubtedly would have used it. But she had none. Drazk very deliberately turned his horse and rode away toward the meadows.

"Oh, won't I fix him!" she said, as she continued her toilet in a fury. She had not the faintest idea what revenge she would take, but she promised herself that it would leave nothing to be desired. Then, because she was young and healthy and an optimist, and did not know what it meant to be afraid, she dismissed the incident from her mind to consider the more urgent matter of breakfast.

Tompkins, the cook, had not needed Transley's suggestion to put his best foot forward when catering to Y.D. and his daughter. Tompkins' soul yearned for a cooking berth that could be occupied the year round. Work in the railway camps had always left him high and dry at the freeze-up—dry, particularly, and a few nights in Calgary or Edmonton saw the end of his season's earnings. Then came a precarious existence for Tompkins until the scrapers were back on the dump the following spring. A steady job, cooking on a ranch like the Y.D.; if Tompkins had written the Apocalypse that would have been his picture of heaven. So he had left nothing undone, even to despatching a courier over night to a railway station thirty miles away for fresh fruit and other delicacies. Another of the gang had been impressed into a trip up the river to a squatter who was suspected of keeping one or two milch cows and sundry hens.

"This way, ma'am," Tompkins was waving as Zen emerged from the grove. "Another of our usual mornings. Hope you slep' well, ma'am." He stood deferentially aside while she ascended the three steps that led into the covered wagon.

Zen gave a little shriek of delight, and Tompkins felt that all his efforts had been well repaid. One end of the table—it was with a sore heart Tompkins had realized that he could not cut down the big table—one end of the table was set with a clean linen cloth and granite dishware scoured until it shone. Besides Zen's plate were grapefruit and sliced oranges and real cream.

"However did you manage it?" she gasped.

"Nothing's too good for Y.D.'s daughter," was the only explanation Tompkins would offer, but, as Zen afterwards said, the smile on his face was as good as another breakfast. After the fruit came porridge, and more cream; then fresh boiled eggs with toast; then fresh ripe strawberries with more cream.

"Mr.—Mr.—"

"Tompkins, ma'am; Cyrus Tompkins," he supplied.

"Well, Mr. Tompkins, you're a wonder, and when there's a new cook to be engaged for the Y.D. I shall think of you."

"Indeed I wish you would, ma'am," he said, earnestly. "This road work's all right, and nobody ever cooked for a better boss than Mr. Transley—savin' it would be your father, ma'am—but I'm a man of family, an' its pretty hard—"

"Family, did you say, Mr. Tompkins? How many of a family have you?"

"Well, it's seven years since I heard from them—I haven't corresponded very reg'lar of late, but they was six—"

The story of Tompkins' family was cut short by the arrival of a team and mowing machine.

"What's up, Fred?" called Tompkins through a window of his dining car to the driver. "Breakfast is just over, an' dinner ain't begun."

For answer the man addressed as Fred slowly produced an iron stake about eighteen inches long and somewhat less than an inch in diameter.

"What kind of shrubbery do you call that, Tompkins?" he demanded.

"Well, it ain't buffalo grass, an' it ain't brome grass, an' I don't figger it's alfalfa," said Tompkins, meditatively.

"No, and it ain't a grub stake," Fred replied, with some sarcasm. "It's a iron stake, growin' right in a nice little clump of grass, and I run on to it and bust my cuttin'-bar all to—that is, all to pieces," he completed rather lamely, taking Zen into his glance.

"I think I follow you," she said, with a smile. "Can you fix it here?"

"Nope. Have to go to town for a new one. Two days' lost time, when every hour counts. Hello! Here comes someone else."

Another of the teamsters was drawing into camp. "Hello,, Fred!" he said, upon coming up with his fellow workman, "you in too? I had a bit of bad luck. I run smash on to an iron stake right there in the ground and crumpled my knife like so much soap."

"I did worse," said Fred, with a grin. "I bust my cuttin'-bar."

The two men exchanged a steady glance for half a minute. Then the newcomer gave vent to a long, low whistle.

This means war, of course, between Y.D. and Landson. What's your guess about it? And who wins?

FIRST MIRACLE OF JESUS

LESSON TEXT—John 2:1-11.

GOLDEN TEXT—"Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it."—John 2:5.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus at a Wedding.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The Miracle at Cana.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—How Jesus Adds to Joy.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Jesus Enriching Social Life.

I. The Marriage Feast (vv. 1, 2).

Marriage was ordained by God and the first wedding was sanctioned by His presence (Gen. 2:22-24). Indeed, He must have performed the first marriage ceremony. It is not only honorable in all (Heb. 13:4) but when based on true affection it is the highest and best of human relationships next to union with the Lord. It promotes the physical, moral and spirtual well-being of both husband and wife and makes possible an atmosphere for the nurture of children. Marriage is not only an honorable relation but a wedding is a most beautiful occasion for all normal human beings.

1. Attended by Jesus' Mother and His Disciples (vv. 1, 2). The friends at this marriage feast were related to Jesus by blood and grace. To be united to Jesus Christ by the bonds of grace does not interfere with normal human relations but sanctifies them.

2. Attended by Jesus (v. 2). God attended the first marriage on earth (Gen. 2:22) and Jesus, who was about His Father's business (Luke 2:49), set a mark of honor upon every spring of human life by gracing this marriage feast with His presence. The Redeemer of man as He entered upon His exalted career thus lifted the holy ordinance of marriage to its proper dignity and beauty. Man by polygamy, adultery, divorce and fornication has basely degraded it.

II. The Anxiety of Jesus' Mother (vv. 3-5).

1. The Wine Failed (v. 3). Although this was a trying social exigency it seems to have been quite natural. The arrival of Jesus and His disciples put a drain upon the resources of the host, for these guests were bidden after they had reached Cana.

2. Mary Presents the Need to Jesus (v. 3). The clear implication is that she requested Him to embrace this opportunity to present His Messianic claims by working a miracle to supply the lack of wine. We may learn two lessons from Mary:

(1) In our great needs, when our resources are exhausted, we like Mary should come to Jesus for help.

(2) Let us not prescribe to Jesus the manner in which His help is to be given. While it was right for Mary to come to Him in her need, it was not her province to dictate how help should be given.

3. Jesus' Assertion of Authority (v. 3). He respectfully reminded His mother that He had passed from her authority—that His Father's will was supreme.

4. Mary's Confidence (v. 5). Although with calm dignity He asserted His authority, there must have been some sign by which He gave her to understand that He would not fail her in this embarrassing emergency. She directed the servants to be ready to carry out whatever instructions He should issue.

III. The Water Made Wine, a Display of Jesus' Creative Power (vv. 6-9).

A miracle is the display of the supernatural. It is not against the laws of nature but the execution of issues beyond nature.

1. The Measure of This Miracle (v. 6). The six vessels had perhaps a capacity of 120 gallons. Jesus is unstinted in His gifts. Twelve baskets were left over from feeding the Five Thousand.

2. Its Freedom From Display (vv. 7, 8). The mighty works of the Lord are not for display, not for the gaze of men. While not for display, it was so real that the disciples and guests knew that it was wrought by divine power.

3. Its Design. Its primary aim was to show the divine glory. Though Jesus would not use His divine power to relieve His own hunger, He responded to the plea to supply the wants of others.

4. Its Reality (v. 9). This was not a sham, a make-believe. To prove its reality it was brought to the governor of the feast, presumably the bridegroom.

IV. The Surprised Table Master (vv. 10, 11).

The excellence of the wine was praised by the ruler of the feast. Christ gives, not only quantity, but quality.

BURMA

Cold-Weather Costumes Among the Karens.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

The ruling classes of Burma, the Burmese proper, have a long civilization behind them; but in the hills of their country, strangely enough, are tribes almost at the level of savagery. These are the Karens, known by name in America because they have responded to the work of American missionaries to a greater extent probably than any other oriental people.

It is halfway on the railway from Rangoon to Mandalay that one gets the first glimpse of the range of hills which mark the home of the Karens. From the train the hills do not look very formidable, but they are heavily covered with jungle, there is practically only one road from the west into the Karen country, and it is only those who are accustomed to hill roads on the borders of China who would call it a road. Others might call it a variety of things, none complimentary.

But it is this inaccessibility which has preserved through the centuries a collection of tribes such as is to be found nowhere else on the earth, at any rate in so circumscribed an area.

The Karen hills do not measure much over sixty or seventy miles from north to south, and average, perhaps, thirty miles wide, but they have several score different clans and tribes, and all these look upon their neighbors with the same suspicion and animosity as the pariah dogs of one quarter of an oriental city have for those of any other quarter.

Even the secret "opium paths" do not exist on the western slopes of the Karen hills. The tribesmen had no wish to come down to the plains, and the Burmese, the former rulers of the country, found it much easier to come from the north.

Animals can climb to the villages, but it is not well to trust to them. It is on record that a baggage elephant took fourteen hours to cover four and a half miles, and would probably have taken much longer if practically all its load had not been brought in by coolies, and these coolies were the hillmen themselves, not outside men.

Still the visit is worth the trouble, and it is an excellent way of reducing weight. The Karens of the hills are savages, no doubt, but not of the kind that eat one another or cut off heads.

There is no need for the visitor to take a great amount of money. Beads and small mirrors and clear glass bottles are much more useful, though latterly not a few villages have become sophisticated enough to like rupees, too. But that is because the girls make necklaces of them.

The White Karens.

There are a great many Karens in the main province of Burma, and they were, and still are, commonly referred to by their Burmese neighbors and strangers within their gates as White Karens. These Karens do not admit the hill peoples, for convenience' sake called Red Karens, to be their relations, and have the same feelings with regard to them that the Abelites have for the Cainites. It is perhaps natural. Nobody cares for poor and ill-conducted relatives.

The White Karen women are scrupulously clean and neatly, if hardly smartly, dressed. It is a matter of opinion whether they are comely, but at any rate they are sleek and built on substantial lines, and their faces are of the kind that appeals to the Zulu or the story-tellers of the Arabian Nights, who preferred the moonface to one of the Greek classical type.

The hill Karens, genuine Red or otherwise, are obtrusively dirty, so dirty that they cannot get any worse, because no more matter can find a place to settle.

Some of these Red Karens wear clothes that force one to believe they are heirlooms, and here and there not a few of the clanswomen might pose day or night, outdoor or in, at a moment's notice, as the witches in "Macbeth." It is a pity, for quite a number of them look as if, after being boiled and scrubbed, they might be well-favored, or at any rate personable.

The Karens are the third most numerous population in Burma. Naturally the Burmese are the preponderating race; next come the Shans, and after them the Karens, with a total of well over a million.

The different clans are as mutually unintelligible to one another as a Cantonese is to a man of Fuchow or a Pekingese. But that does not prevent Sir George Grierson, the great authority on the ethnology of the Indian empire, from deciding that Karen is a group of dialects, not of languages, and that it includes only the one language, Karen, spoken in greatly varying patois.

We do not know the original home of the Burmese, or of the Tai, usually called Shans, but what we do know of them, though it is neither extensive nor exact, is full compared with our information as to the source of the Karens. The most baffling thing is that they have no national comprehensive name for themselves, not even for the most numerous and enlightened branch, the White Karens, and what legends they have only lead the learned to disagree, more or less acrimoniously, with one another.

If one were to judge by build and facial characteristics, there is no family connection between the White and the Red Karen. The White Karen is heavy, stolid, and much more stocky in build even than the average Burman. He is what might be called a "worthy" person in the most offensive sense of the word. He is bovine, suspicious, and without any sense of humor. Except in very hot weather, he does not wash himself as often as he ought, and he would certainly defeat prohibition by brewing his own.

The Red Karens.

The Red Karen is of an entirely different physical type. The men are small and wizened, but very wiry. They have broad, reddish-brown faces and long heads, with the obliquity of eye a little more accentuated than the White Karen, and very much more than the Burman. In former days it was the invariable custom that the men should have the rising sun tattooed in bright vermilion on the small of the back. This custom has fallen into disuse; and the younger men are without it, but they are so desperately dirty, old and young, that a personal detail of this kind is hardly noticeable.

They wear short trunks reaching to just below the knee. These are red when new, but they speedily turn to an earthy color. These "shorts" are kept in position by a leather belt, and in the hot weather constitute the entire dress, except for a cloth wound around the head, above which the hair appears, tied in a knot.

The women wear a short skirt which comes as far as the knee. Usually it is dark-colored, but occasionally it is red. A broad piece of black cloth passes over the back across the right shoulder, and is then draped over the bosom, and confined at the waist by a white girdle, knotted in front, sash-fashion, with flowing ends hanging down with more or less grace, according to the length of time it has been worn.

Round the waist and neck are ropes of barbaric beads, to which the wealthy occasionally add long necklaces of rupees. A profusion of the beads also decorates the leg just above the calf, which is circled by a solid mass of garters of black cord or rattan.

The result is that their wearers walk with a sort of compass-like action, and could not run, no matter what the urgency might be. Moreover, it is not easy for them to sit down, and when they do at market stalls or to spin, they stretch their legs straight in front of them. This, to the Shan and Burmese mind, is highly indecorous, for with them the first law in society manners is to hide the feet.

Silver earrings, some of them so large as to be better called ear-cylinders, are worn, and over the head is jauntily thrown a piece of black cloth with red tassels, like those of the Taungthu. The general effect is picturesque and would be really attractive, were it not for a not uncommon meaty odor.

Many Feet of Lumber in This Forest King

The Pacific slope is noted the world over for its magnificent forests. These consist for the most part of conifers —pine, cedar, hemlock, spruce and other species—of which many attain enormous size and tower aloft for hundreds of feet.

Not long ago a giant yellow fir was found in Oregon by loggers working at Bling slough. This venerable king of the forest was felled and the butt section placed on an iron platform car. The tree was perfectly sound throughout.

The log was 28 feet long, 110 inches in diameter at the butt and 95 inches in diameter at the upper end. It weighed more than 23 tons, and contained 12,000 feet of lumber, board measure. The tree from which it was cut was 431 years old, and rose to a height of 200 feet without a limb. Seven sections of this tree which were logged yielded together 40,000 feet of lumber. The log was cut into first-class flooring and sold at a good price.

Did Seem Peculiar

Girl friend bought a slip-on, which, as cognoscenti know, is the filmy thing a lady gets into first. Then she went to a theater and lost the package. Called up the manager.

"Was anything found in Box A after the matinee?" she asked.

"Don't know," said the manager. "I'll inquire. What was it?"

Girl friend blushed unseen at the other end of the wire. Then she stammered:

"It—it was a slip-on."

"I'll ask," said the manager. "But how in the name of Mike did you manage to lose it?"—Atlanta Constitution.

"Mizpah"

The word "mizpah" means "watch-tower." In Genesis 31:49, there is the story of Jacob and his uncle, who made a heap of stones which by Laban was called "Jegarsahadutha." The story continues: "And Laban said: 'This heap is a witness between me and thee this day.' Therefore, was the name of it called Galead; and Mizpah; for he said, 'The Lord watch between me and thee when we are absent one from another.'" These last 14 words are the commonly accepted interpretation of "mizpah."

POINTS ON KEEPING WELL

Dr. Frederick R. Green, Editor of "Health."

(©, 1924, Western Newspaper Union.)

OUR NATIONAL CRIME

THE most common mistake of Americans is overeating.

With all our grumbling and complaining there is probably no country in the world, today, where the majority of the people get as much to eat as in this country.

The three kinds of food in which we are particularly prone to overindulge are sugar and starches, which are very much the same, and fats.

The consumption of candy, ice creams and soft drinks, all containing large quantities of sugar, has enormously increased in this country in the last 25 years. The general use of white breads, breakfast foods and other cereals has also increased.

Our forefathers, who were raised on a diet of cornmeal, whole wheat bread made of home-ground flour, bacon, ham, fresh meats, eggs and fresh vegetables, did not have an opportunity of eating the quantities of sugar and starches that we have on every hand today.

Now, sugar and breakfast foods are good foods.

The trouble is that we have retained our forefathers' diet and have added our present-day improvements, instead of using the present forms of confections and cereals as substitutes for some of the older forms of diet. The result is that we are eating a double allowance and are suffering therefor.

Fat is the surplus food which the body does not use and which has to be carried around as extra weight.

During the years of growth the body needs plenty of food for proper nutrition and body building, but after growth and development are completed only enough food is required to replace the natural loss and to keep the body functioning properly.

Every extra pound is a handicap.

Stand on the corner of any crowded city street and watch the people go by. It doesn't matter whether you select Michigan avenue in Chicago, Fifth avenue in New York, Commonwealth avenue in Boston, or Market street in San Francisco. Neither does it matter whether you observe people in the tenement-house district or on the boulevards.

The great majority of Americans are overweight.

We are eating too much because we have it to eat and we haven't learned yet to eat what is good for us rather than to eat all we can get.

And this in spite of the fact that the best evidence obtainable shows that the individuals who live longest and enjoy the greatest activity and the best health are the "hound dog" type—lean and lanky and wiry.

Avoid fat if you want to live a long and healthy life.

FATIGUE

WHAT is fatigue? What happens when we get tired? Everybody knows the sensation, but just how is it caused? What does it mean when we say that we are "all in," and just what has happened to us?

In the first place we have probably not had enough fresh air, or, putting it the other way around, we probably have had too much air that wasn't fresh, too much stale, vitiated air.

We have probably stayed too long in rooms that were overcrowded or overheated.

Then our eyes have probably been exposed to glare from unshaded lights that fatigue the muscles of the eye and make us feel tired.

Or perhaps we have been sitting too long on uncomfortable chairs or benches.

It doesn't matter whether we have been in an office, a factory, or a theater; sitting too long at a time on seats that are improperly adjusted to our bodies is tiring, whether we are working or playing.

Maybe our clothing is uncomfortable. In spite of the freedom of present-day dress, such as the flapper costume, for instance, many people still wear uncomfortable clothing, especially uncomfortable shoes, which restrict the muscles and cause irritation and fatigue.

Perhaps we have been sitting too long walking too long, or playing too long and have so tired out one group of muscles without resting them by using another group.

Or we may have been surrounded by persons who were irritating or annoying, or by those who have bored us, so that we have been under constant mental irritation.

Any one of these things will tire us out; a combination of two or three of them will, of course, increase the fatigue.

When one is tired, his resistance to disease is lowered, so that his susceptibility to infection, is increased.

The sensible individual, when he is unusually tired, instead of going to the theater, the ballroom, or the crowded public places for recreation, will lie down in a quiet, cool, well ventilated room and rest until his mental and physical balance is restored.

He will then be not only in better condition to enjoy his recreation, but he may also guard himself against possibility of a serious illness.

Her Neighbor's Advice Helped Mrs. Frick

MRS. ADA FRICK
PERRYSBURG, OHIO

"YOU can be just as healthy, strong and happy as I am,' said one woman to her neighbor after listening to the description of her ailments,—'if you will take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. My condition was very similar to yours, I suffered from those awful bearing down pains, weakness, backache, nervousness and headaches until I could hardly drag around. Today I am strong, well and happy because I followed the advice of a friend who had been greatly benefited by this old-fashioned root and herb medicine."

Nearly fifty years ago Lydia E. Pinkham of Lynn, Mass. prepared from medicinal roots and herbs Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Its fame has spread from shore to shore. You will now find in every community or neighborhood some woman who has been restored to health by its use, or has some friend who has. Therefore ask your neighbor.

Thousands of unsolicited testimonials such as the following are on file at the Pinkham Laboratory at Lynn, Mass., and prove the merit of this medicine. Therefore no woman should continue to suffer from such ailments.

Mrs. Frick Tells of Her Experience

PERRYSBURG, OHIO—"I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound because I suffered with pains in my sides all the time. I can't remember just how long I suffered but it was for some time. One day I was talking with a neighbor and I told her how I was feeling and she said she had been just like I was with pains and nervous troubles and she took the Vegetable Compound and it helped her. So then I went and got some and I certainly recommend it for it is good. Whenever I see a woman who is sick I try to get her to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. ADA FRICK, R. Elephant's Tusks

The tusks of the elephant are merely projections of the incisors of the upper jaw and are never shed, although they are sometimes broken off. In other words, the tusks are part of the elephant's teeth. However, the milk teeth, which precede the tusks, come out at an early age. The tusks of the elephant supply the ivory which is so highly esteemed the world over for ornamental purposes. Among the Indian or Asiatic elephants only the male has the tusks, but they are found on both the male and female of the African species.

Thousands Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It

Applicants for Insurance Should Use Swamp-Root

Judging from reports from druggists who are constantly in direct touch with the public, there is one preparation that has been very successful in overcoming these conditions. The mild and healing influence of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its remarkable record of success.

An examining physician for one of the prominent Life Insurance Companies, in an interview of the subject, made the astonishing statement that one reason why so many applicants for insurance are rejected is because kidney trouble is so common to the American people, and the large majority of those whose applications are declined do not even suspect that they have the disease. Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is on sale at all drug stores in bottles of two sizes, medium and large.

However, if you wish first to test this great preparation, send ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a sample bottle. When writing, be sure and mention this paper.—Advertisement.

Generous, Indeed

Loungers at the club had a certain man under discussion. Some said he was generous. Some said otherwise. Finally a lawyer walked in who knew the man well. To the newcomer they appealed to say whether the individual in question was generous or not.

World's Oldest Banks

The oldest existing bank in the world is said to be the Bank of Barcelona, in Spain, which was founded in 1401. England's first bank was opened in 1603 by Francis Child, a goldsmith. A number of other goldsmiths immediately followed suit. The Mint in the Tower of London had been the depository for the cash of merchants until Charles the First seized the money as a loan. Then the traders began to deposit their cash with the goldsmiths in Lombard street.

Well, It Does

Mrs. James had just moved into the neighborhood and it was her first meeting with the local sewing circle. As the conversation turned on the absent men, one of the ladies said to Mrs. James: "What does your husband do?" "Oh!" said Mrs. James, "he is manager of a pail factory." "Pail factory?" said the other. "Why, I didn't know we had such a factory in town. Where is it located?" "Well," replied Mrs. James, "husband calls it a bucket shop, but I think pail factory sounds much better."—Hamilton (Ont.) Herald.

The return trip is still 50 cents more; but any way the Chancellor boys are always on the spot.

RESTORES HEALTH

Spinal adjustments restore health if taken as I advise. A man got well of rheumatism in one adjustment recently. Another was restored to good health in three adjustments. A lady is much improved after two adjustments.

If you have rheumatism, neuritis neuralgia, sciatica, it will yield to adjustments. Chronic ailments of lungs, stomach, liver, kidneys and other organs get well when spinal adjustments are taken.

Main Street not Wall Street ~ owns the Railroads

Fifty million Americans---nearly one half of our total population, and more than twice the number that have ever voted in a presidential election---are directly interested in railroad securities. Read this statement again, and consider the enormous responsibility that rests with the managements of the carriers in handling such a trust fund.

About two million citizens are owners of railroad stocks and railroad bonds; their names appearing on the record books. The remaining 48 million people are no less owners of these securities, tho somewhat less directly.

Two billion dollars worth of railroad securities are owned by the forty million people who compose the life insurance companies; for 25% of the reserve of these companies has been invested in railroad stocks and bonds.

One out of every four Americans has a savings account, and more than one billion dollars of savings-bank funds are invested in railroad securities. The great fire insurance companies, with thirty million policies protecting the property in the United States, are heavy investors in railroad securities.

Remember these things when you hear the railroads attacked by poorly-posted and in some instances vicious people. The welfare of American railroads is your welfare. Help them to continue the splendid work that they are now doing, and remember also that you and your neighbors are the real owners of the railroads.

Credit for some of these figures is given to "The American Ways" Vol. No. 2. of the Bank of Manhattan Company Library.

A Well Kept Cemetery

There is in the black belt of Alabama a little town, smaller in size than Sylacauga. It hasn't the vast resources and wealth that surround us, but it has a cemetery that is the pride of the town, with many inviting appearances that makes one long to rest among its e n the silver cord is brok- and the sound of the grinding is still. In this town there is a cemetery organization that has operated for years, at a small membership fee to which everybody contributes. The cemetery is so perfectly kept that there is not a leaf out of place. It is sodded in grass, always mowed. Winding through it are concrete driveways, and walks, bordered with roses and many flowers. When a citizen of that town enters into his eternal sleep, his relatives are proud to lay his rmains among flowers and shrubs in the heart of the beauty of nature. There is not that heart aching lonelessness that hurts those left behind, when some dear one is placed in an unkempt cemetery where fences have fallen down, and weeds run rank. There is a difference and the spirit of Sylacalga is rapidly turning to the cemetery beautiful, which will surely follow the present project.

Final Adjournment.

Farr Reunion Was A Happy Occasion

(By R. B. Posey)

Harpersville, Ala., August 2.—It was our good pleasure to attend the fifth reunion of the Farr family at the old homestead near Wilsonville last Wednesday and it was a grand affair. Mr. John Farr was 62 years old when he died and had lived at the same place most all his life, and was buried within twenty feet of where he was born. His wife has been dead quite a while and she too was buried there

They raised 11 children and they are all living, but one and are as follows: Mrs. J. H. Stone, Harpersville; Mrs. Sallie McClendon, Gadsden; Mrs. G. R. Stone, Wilsonville; Mrs. Nannie Curlee, Shelby; C. C. Farr, Wilsonville; Mrs. George Archer, Wilsonville; Mrs. W. C. Eastis, Vincent; F. S. Farr, Wilsonville; Lester Farr, Sylacauga; and Mrs. George Lyon, Alabama City; They were all there but Mrs. Eastis, and quite a number of grand children were present.

Preceeding the serving of a bountiful dinner, spread beneath the stately oak trees, Rev. C. N. Nolen made a short address which was very appropriate to the occasion.

The children delighted in the waters flowing from the large spring, and the older folk enjoyed reminiscing of other days—days gone by. Then goody byes were said until July 29, 1925

When this gathering first started there were few outside of the connection who attened but it has grown, and grown until now most all the county takes part and it won't be long until it will be widely known as the Union Memorial services near Westover.

We have already received sevesal invitations to attend the next one and if we are living we are going.

A Good Pasture Is Part of the Crop

(By A. A. Lauderdale, County Agent, Shelby County)

Permanent pasture is essential on the farm, for, regardless of the type of farming one is doing, some livestock is kept.

The time is coming when we will think of the pasture as one of our crops, and give it a chance

A permanent pasture is an area of land which should furnish an abundance of palatable grazing from 8 to 10 months in the year.

What is your pasture doing now, and what could you do to improve it? A pasture must have the following:

1. Plenty of moisture
2. Nutriticus, palatable and adapted grasses.
3. Freedom from foreign weeds and bushes.

If your pasture is already located with plenty of moisture, and set with lespedeza carpet and dallis grasses, then cut off the bushes, and run the mower over the pasture to get the competing weeds before they seed.

If the farmers will give their pastures a chance, they can have just as good pastures in Shelby county, as the Central of Georgia Railroad has established in Talladega or any other county in Alabama.

This is a good time to clear out your branch bottoms, and get ready to seed them in good pasture grasses next February or March.

Why not prepare now to produce cheap feed in the form of a good pasture for your cattle, whether you have 1 cow or 10 cows?

"KEEPING WELL."

What is appendicitis? Is face powder harmful? Are "spring tonics" necessary? Have good roads any effect on health? Is pneumonia preventable?

"Keeping Well," a new health service written and edited by Frederick R. Green, M. D., nationally known as the editor of HEALTH and for his contributions to medical literature, has become a regular department of the Shelby County Reporter.

Answers to these questions and thousands of others will be given by Doctor Green in this new service.

All of his articles are to the point and deal with physical facts concerning the well-being of the human mechanism. Look for "Keeping Well," which will be found on another page in this issue, and watch for this department each week in the Reporter.

STATE REFUSES TO PROSECUTE

CASE OF OUDREY BOYLES, FORMER DISTRICT ATTORNEY, DISPOSED OF IN LESS THAN HALF HOUR.

Mobile, Ala.—The case of the State of Alabama versus Aubrey Boyles, former district attorney, charged with attempting to corruptly influence an officer, was disposed of in less than half an hour.

Two motions, one to remand the case to the circuit court and one to nol prosse the case were heard by Federal Judge Ervin, who denied the competency of the state court to try Boyles and overruled the first motion Solicitor Bert Chamberlain thereupon said he did not care to proceed with the case, and that inasmuch as Judge Ervin had said that William E. Holcomb Jr., the complaining witness, is not in his opinion an officer of the law, he would ask to nol prosse the case.

Disposal of the case by a technicality did not come as a surprise. Informal conferences between counsel Thursday revealed that Judge Ervin would rule that Holcomb was not an officer but the motion to remand came as a surprise. It is understood that a mandamus lies in this motion, while a nol prosse does not dispose of the charges.

Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt, assistant attorney general from Washington, arrived here Friday to serve as a government witness.

Mrs. Willebrandt is Mr. Boyles superior officer, and the defense intended to prove by her, it is understood, that Boyles' alleged proposals to William E. Holcomb, Jr., former sheriff and complainant in the case, were part of a scheme to unearth graft in this city. The defense alleged it had correspondence between Mrs. Willebrandt and Mr Boyles to prove this.

Dismissal of the case on a purely technical point was resisted by Mr. Boyles and his attorney, Nicholas E. Stallworth. They said they were willing to go ahead with the case on its merits.

The court,, however, decreed that the law was very clear that he must dismiss the case in view of the fact that Holcombe had been shown not to be an officer.

With the nol prossal of the Boyle case ends another phase of the famous liquor conspiracy case that has already resulted in 11 convictions and prison sentences against former prominent city and county officials.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF.

Restoration of depleted oyster areas, under provisions of an act of the 1923 legislature, through planting of seed oysters, will be pushed as fast as available funds accrue to the credit of the sea food division of the department of game and fisheries, according to Commissioner I. T. Quinn.

The state pardon board will hold its August meeting August 26. The meeting was first set for August 12, but owing to the fact that Attorney General Davis will attend camp at Camp McClellan, and that Auditor Allgood will be on his vacation, the meeting was deferred two weeks.

Actual work of repairing the bridge over the Alabama river at Selma will begin in ten days. Plans have been made by H. H. Houk, of the state bridge department, and have been checked by W. K. Upchurch, who is the engineer placed in charge of the work.

BLOUSE IS NOW PARAMOUNT; CLOTH DRESS FOR AUTUMN

'TIS a reckless mood in which we find Dame Fashion, in regard to the separate blouse. "The more the merrier," says she, a blouse for every occasion if you will. It may be as gay as gay can be, none too bizarre striped, plaited or otherwise, sleeveless or sleeved to the wrist, severely tailored or super-elaborated, thus are we given latitude in the choice of a separate blouse.

Nevertheless, there are many definite style points which indicate the course this is an exaggerated type, but it goes to prove the extremes to which the modern blouse trends. For fall the outlook is for the long tunic blouse, fanciful and colorful.

Already in matters of dress are we anticipating autumn. If we are wise, in times of midsummer we prepare for coming fall weather. The stylish striped cloth frock in the picture answers the problem of what to choose for forthcoming cool days.

It is just such a costume as gives fashion trend. A leading trend is expressed in straightline silhouettes. The model here pictured illustrates the idea. Again striped flanneis and crepes are quite the newest fabrics for blouse fashioning, just such as the type here shown. And again, flowing ties and scarf effects mark the majority of sportswear blouse types.

It is apropos that the fanciful tie on the blouse in the picture be embroidered with tennis racquet designs, which no doubt settles the matter that this particular blouse is designed to be worn especially at tennis court.

Speaking of smart tie effects, the slotted tie model is the last word in a smart appearance at the office, for shopping or for any practical daytime affair. If it is good to look upon in newspaper print, it is infinitely more so in the original of its rich brown, hair-lined with white. The straight tube-like silhouette is maintained, for fashion decrees long slender lines for the street coat dress. The collar and frill are of white crepe, the latter piped with brown satin. Long tight sleeves here give warning of their vogue for the immediate future.

The beltless silhouette dominates the fall showings of cloth and flannel street dresses. For practical everyday wear, flannel in solid bright colors or fancifully striped is one of the smartest among advance materials. Strict simplicity is adhered to in the fashioning of the one-piece flannel or cloth dress. Wool rep and heavy bengaline silk are also featured.

A novelty touch is the capelet, which is usually fitted into the shoulder lines. Glimpsing advance models, one notes interesting trimming details such as stenciled leather collar and cuffs, and buttons sewed on fancifully.

Many of the early dress models reflect the directoire trend.

Very fetching are the new gold leather belts, which appear on some of the imported cloth dresses. Gold kid, trimming a navy cloth rep, suggests fashions in store for autumn.

The two friends discussed at great length the details of the Big Idea, and upon arrival in the West, Linder lost no time in preparing blueprints and charts descriptive of the improvements to be made on the land and the order in which the work was to be carried on. Grant bought a tract suitable to his purpose, and the wheels of the machine were set in motion. When this had been done Grant turned to the working out of his own individual experiment.

During the period in which these arrangements were being made it was inevitable that Grant should have heard more or less of Transley. He had not gone out of his way to seek information of the contractor, but it rather had been forced upon him. Transley's name was frequently heard in the offices of the business men with whom he had to do; it was mentioned in local papers with the regularity peculiar to celebrities in comparatively small centers. Transley, it appeared, had become something of a power in the land. Backed by old Y.D.'s capital, he had carried some rather daring ventures through to success. He had seized the panicky moments following the outbreak of the war to buy heavily on the wheat and cattle markets, and increases in prices due to the world's demand for food had made him one of the wealthy men of the city. The desire of many young farmers to enlist had also afforded an opportunity to acquire their holdings for small considerations, and Transley had proved his patriotism by facilitating the ambitions of as many men in this position as came to his attention. The fact that even before the war ended the farms which he acquired in this way were worth several times the price he paid was only an incident in the transactions.

But no word of Transley's domestic affairs reached Grant, who told himself that he had ceased to be interested in them, but kept an alert ear nevertheless. It would seem that Transley rather eclipsed his wife in the public eye.

So Grant set about with the development of his own farm, and kept his mind occupied with it and with his larger experiment—except when it went flirting with thoughts of Phyllis Bruce. He had written to Murdoch to engage Phyllis at any price and bring her West with him. She would be needed in the new business. He had intimated that the change would be permanent, and that it might be well to bring the family. . . .

He selected a farm where a ridge of foothills overlooked a broad valley receding into the mountains. The dealer had no idea of selling him this particular piece of land; they were bound for a half section farther up the slope when Grant stopped on the brow of the hill to feast his eyes on the scene that lay before him. It burst upon him with the unexpectedness peculiar to the foothill valleys; miles of gently undulating plain, lying apparently far below, but in reality rising in a sharp ascent toward the snow-capped mountains looking down silently through their gauze of blue-purple afternoon mist. At distances which even his trained eye would not attempt to compute lay little round lakes like silver coins on the surface of the prairie; here and there were dark green bluffs of spruce; to the right a ribbon of river, blue-green above where the rapids churned it white, and along its edge a fringe of leafy cottonwoods; at vast intervals square black plots of plowed land like sections on a chessboard of the gods, and farm buildings cut so clear in the mountain atmosphere that the sense of space was lost and they seemed like child-houses just across the way.

Grant turned to his companion with an animation on his face which almost startled the prosaic dealer in real estate.

"Wonderful! Wonderful!" he exclaimed. 'We don't need to go any farther if you can sell me this.'

"Sure I can sell you this," said the dealer, looking at him somewhat queerly. "That is, if you want it. I thought you were looking for a wheat farm."

The man's total lack of appreciation irritated Grant unreasonably. "Wheat fills the belly," he retorted, "but sunsets keep alive the soul. What is the price?"

Again the dealer gave him a queer sidelong look, and made as though to argue with him, then suddenly seemed to change his purpose. Perhaps he reflected that strange things happened to the boys overseas.

"I'll get you the price in town," he said. "You are sure it will suit?"

"Suit? No king in Christendom has a palace on a site like this. I'd go around the world for it."

"You're the doctor," said the dealer, turning his car.

Grant completed the purchase, ordered lumber for a house and barn, and engaged a carpenter to superintend the construction. It was one of his whims that he would do most of the work himself.

"I guess I'm rather a man of whims," he reflected, as he stood on the brow of the hill where the material for his buildings had been delivered. "It was a whim which first brought me West again. I have a whim about my buildings. I do not do as other people do, which is the unpardonable sin. To Linder I am a jester, to Murdoch a fanatic, to our friend the real estate dealer a fool; I even noticed my honest carpenter trying to ask me something about shell shock! Well—they're my whims, and I get an immense amount of satisfaction out of them."

The days that followed were the happiest Grant had known since childhood. The carpenter, a thin, twisted man, bowed with much labor at the bench, and answering to the name Peter, sold his services by the day and manifested a sympathy amounting to an indulgence toward the whims of his employer. So long as the wages were sure Peter cared not whether the house was finished this year or next—or not at all. He enjoyed Grant's cooking in the temporary workshed they had built; he enjoyed Grant's stories of funny incidents of the war which would crop out at unexpected moments, and which were always good for a new pipe and a few minutes' rest; he even essayed certain flights of his own, which showed that Peter was a creature not entirely without humor. He developed an appreciation of scenery; he would stand for long intervals gazing across the valley. Grant was not deceived by these little devices, but he never took Peter to task for his loitering. "If the old dodger isn't quite paying his way now, no doubt he has more than paid it many times in the past," he mused. "This is an occasion upon which to temper justice with mercy."

But it was in the planning and building of the house he found his real delight. He laid it out on very modest lines, as became the amount of money he was prepared to spend. It was to be a single-story bungalow, with veranda round the south and west. The living-room ran across the south side; into its east wall he built a capacious fireplace, with narrow slits of windows to right and left, and in the western wall were deep French windows commanding the magic of the view across the valley. The dining-room, too, faced to the west, with more French windows to let in sun and soul. The kitchen was to the east, and off the kitchen lay Grant's bedroom, facing also to the east, as becomes a man who rises early for his day's labor. And then facing the west, and opening off the dining-room, was what he was pleased to call his whim-room.

The idea of the whim-room came upon him as he was working out plans on the smooth side of a board, and thinking about things in general, and a good deal about Phyllis Bruce, who had just arrived from the East, and wondering if he should ever run across Zen Transley. It struck him all of a sudden, as had the Big Idea that night when he was on his way home from Murdoch's house. He worked it out surreptitiously, not allowing even old Peter to see it until he had made it into his plan, and then he described it just as the whim-room. But it was to be by all means the best room in the house; special finishing and flooring lumber were to be bought for it; the fireplace had to be done in a peculiarly delicate tile; the French windows must be high and wide and of the most brilliant transparency. . .

The ring of the saw, the trill of the plane, the thwack of the hammer, were very pleasant music in his ears. Day by day he watched his dwelling grow with the infinite joy of creating, and night after night he crept with Peter into the workshed and slept the sleep of a man tired and contented. In the long summer evenings the sunlight hung like a champagne curtain over the mountains even after bedtime, and Grant had to cut a hole in the wall of the shed that he might watch the dying colors of the day fade from crimson to purple to blue on the tassels of cloud-wraith floating in the western sky. At times Linder and Murdoch would visit him to report progress on the Big Idea, and the three would sit on a bench in the half-built house, sweet with the fragrance of new sawdust, and smoke placidly while they determined matters of policy or administration.

Grant was almost sorry when the house was finished. "There's so much more enjoyment in doing things than in merely possessing them after they're done," he philosophized to Linder. "I think that must be the secret of the peculiar fascination of the West. The East, with all its culture and conveniences and beauty, can never win a heart which has once known the West. That is because in the East all the obvious things are done, but in the West they are still to do."

"You should worry," said Linder. "You still have the plowing."

"Yes, and as soon as the stable is finished I am going to buy four horses and get to work."

"I supposed you would use a tractor."

"Not this time. I can admire a piece of machinery, but I can't love it. I can love horses."

"You'll be housing them in the whim-room," Linder remarked dryly, and had to jump to escape the hammer which his chief shied at him.

But the plowing was really a great experience. Grant had an eye for horseflesh, and the four dapple grays which pressed their fine shoulders into the harness of his breaking plow might have delighted the heart of any teamster. As he sat on his steel seat and watched the colter cut the firm sod with brittle cracking sound as it snapped the tough roots of the wild roses, or, looking back, saw the regular terraces of shiny black mold which marked his progress, he felt that he was engaged in a rite of almost sacramental significance.

"To take a substance straight from the hand of the Creator and be the first in all the world to impose a human will upon it is surely an occasion for solemnity and thanksgiving," he soliloquized. "How can anyone be so gross as to see only materialism in such work as this? Surely it has something of fundamental religion in it! Just as from the soil springs all physical life, may it not be that deep down in the soil are, some way, the roots of the spiritual? The soil feeds the city in two ways: it fills its belly with material food, and it is continually revitalizing its spirit with fresh streams of energy which can come only from the land. Up from the soil comes life, all progress, all development—"

At that moment Grant's plowshare struck a submerged boulder, and he was dumped precipitately into that element which he had been so generously apostrophizing. The well-trained horses came to a stop as he gathered himself up, none the worse, and regained his seat.

"That was a spill," he commented. "Ditched not only myself, but my whole train of thought. Never mind; perhaps I was dangerously close to the development of a new whim, and I am well supplied in that particular already. Hello, whom have we here?"

The horses had come to a stop a short distance before the end of the furrow, and Grant, glancing ahead, saw immediately in front of them a little chap of four or five obstructing the way. He stood astride of the furrow with widespread legs bridging the distance from the virgin prairie to the upturned sod. He was hatless, and curls of silkly yellow hair fell about his round, bright face. His hands were stuck unobtrusively in his trouser pockets.

"Well, son, what's the news?" said Grant, when the two had measured each other for a moment.

"I got braces," the boy replied proudly. "Don't you see?"

"Why, so you have!" Grant exclaimed. "Come around here until I see them better."

So encouraged, the little chap came skipping around the horses, and exhibited his braces for Grant's admiration. But he had already become interested in another subject.

"You Should Worry," Said Linder. "You Still Have the Plowing."

"Are these your horses?" he demanded.

"Yes."

"Will they bite?"

"Why, no, I don't believe they would. They have been very well brought up."

"What do you call them?"

"This one is Prince, on the left, and the others are Queen, and King, and Knave. I call him Knave because he's always scheming, trying to get out of his share of the work, and I make him walk on the plowed land, too."

"That serves him right," the boy declared. "What's your name?"

"Why—what's yours?"

"Wilson."

"Wilson what?"

"Just Wilson."

"What does your mother call you?"

"Just Wilson. Sometimes daddy calls me Bill."

"Oh!"

"What's your name?"

"Call me The Man on the Hill."

"Do you live on the hill?"

"Yes."

"Is that your house?"

"Yes."

"Did you make it?"

"Yes."

"All yourself?"

"No. Peter helped me."

"Who's Peter?"

"He is the man who helped me."

"Oh!"

These credentials exchanged, the boy fell silent, while Grant looked down upon him with a whimsical admixture of humor and tenderness. Suddenly, without a word, the boy dashed as fast as his legs could carry him to the end of the field, and plunged into a clump of bushes. In a moment he emerged with something brown and chubby in his arms.

"He's my teddy," he said to Grant. "He was watching in the bushes to see if you were a nice man."

"And am I?" Grant was tempted to ask.

"Yes." There was no evasion about Wilson. He approved of his new acquaintance, and said so.

"Let us give teddy a ride on Prince?"

"Let's!"

Grant carefully arranged teddy on the horse's hames, and the boy clapped his hands with delight.

"Now let us all go for a ride. You will sit on my knee, and teddy will drive Prince."

He took the boy carefully on his knee, driving with one hand and holding him in place with the other. The little body resting confidently against his side was a new experience for Grant.

"We must drive carefully," he remarked. "Here and there are big stones hidden in the grass. If we were to hit one it might dump us off."

The little chap chuckled. "Nothing could dump you off," he said.

Grant reflected that such implicit and unwarranted confidence implied a great responsibility, and he drove with corresponding care. A mishap now might nip this very delightful little bud of hero-worship.

They turned the end of the furrow with a fine jingle of loose trace-chains, and Prince trotted a little on account of being on the outer edge of the semi-circle. The boy clapped his hands again as teddy bounced up and down on the great shoulders.

"Have you a little boy?" he asked, when they were started again.

"Why, no," Grant confessed, laughing at the question.

"Why?"

There was no evading this childish inquisitor. He had a way of pursuing a subject to bedrock.

"Well, you see, I've no wife."

"No mother?"

"No—no wife. You see—"

"But I have a mother—"

"Of course, and she is your daddy's wife. You see they have to have that—"

Grant found himself getting into deep water, but the sharp little intellect had cut a corner and was now ahead of him.

"Then I'll be your little boy," he said, and, clambering up to Grant's shoulder, pressed a kiss on his cheek. In a sudden burst of emotion Grant brought his team to a stop and clasped the little fellow in both his arms. For a moment everything seemed misty.

"And I have lived to be thirty-two years old and have never known what this meant," he said to himself.

"Daddy's hardly ever home, anyway," the boy added, naively.

"Where is your home?"

"Down beside the river. We live there in summer."

And so the conversation continued and the acquaintanceship grew as man and boy plied back and forth on their mile-long furrow. At length it occurred to Grant that he should send Wilson home; the boy's long absence might be occasioning some uneasiness. They stopped at the end of the field and carefully removed teddy from his place of prestige, but just at that moment a horsefly buzzing about caused Prince to stamp impatiently, and the big hoof came down on the boy's foot. Wilson sent up a cry proportionate to the possibilities of the occasion, and Grant in alarm tore off the boot and stocking. Fortunately the soil had been soft, and the only damage done was a slight bruise across the upper part of the foot.

"There, there," said Grant, soothingly, caressing the injury with his fingers. "It will be all right in a minute. Prince didn't mean to do it, and besides, I've seen much worse than that at the war."

At the mention of the war the boy suspended a cry half-uttered.

"Were you at the war?" he demanded.

"Yes."

"Did you kill 'em in the tummy?"

"We'll talk about that tomorrow. Now you hop up on my shoulders, and I'll tie the horses and then carry you home."

He followed the boy's directions until they led him to a path running among pleasant trees down by the river. Presently he caught a glimpse of a cottage in a little open space, its brown-shingled walls almost smothered in a riot of sweet peas.

"That's our house. Don't you like it?" said the boy, who had already forgotten his injury.

"I think it is splendid." And Grant, taking his young charge from his shoulder, stepped up on to the porch and knocked at the screen door.

In a moment it was opened by Zen Transley.

Common Labor

The cripple thumped his crutch on the ground as he confronted his lawyer.

"Heavens, man!" he exclaimed. "You are taking four-fifths of my damages. I never heard of such extortion!"

The lawyer smiled.

"I furnished the skill, the eloquence and the necessary legal learning of your case," he replied coolly.

"Yes," said the client, "but I furnished the case itself."

"Bosh!" sneered the lawyer. "Anybody could fall down a coal hole!"

Double Danger

"That young man proposed to me last night, mother. What shall I do?"

"But, my child, you've only known him two weeks."

"I know, mother; but if I delay in accepting him he might find out some things about me he won't like, too."—Boston Transcript.

HOW TO KEEP WELL

Dr. Frederick R. Green, Editor of "Health."

BETTER ROADS — BETTER HEALTH

EVERYONE admits the value of good roads, but what possible connection is there between good roads and health?

Good roads have always been regarded as one of the necessities of a civilized state. The old Romans were famous road builders and some of their highways are still in existence.

Macaulay, in his "History of England," says: "Of all inventions of the human mind, the alphabet and the printing press alone excepted, those inventions which have bridged distance have done most for the civilization of man." Steamboats and railroads made possible the exploration of the civilized world in the Nineteenth century. The automobile, airplane and the radio are going to complete its civilization by bringing all nations and races together.

But what have good roads to do with health?

The state board of health of Kansas says that good roads prevent disease.

How?

In many ways.

The removal of weeds and trash and the drainage which follows road building destroy breeding places for mosquitoes, flies and other insects which are known as disease carriers, not to mention chinchbugs, grasshoppers, and other pests which hurt the crops.

Hard roads and oiled roads also promote drainage and prevent insect breeding. Dry roads offer pedestrians and especially children who are compelled to walk to and from school, a dry path.

Good roads promote travel and make it easier for the farmer to move his produce, to get his supplies and to take his family to town. Good roads and automobiles have improved health by making it possible for the doctor to see more patients and to see them more promptly, to send his patients, when necessary, to a hospital and to give them better care.

Good roads have made it possible for townships to unite in building central high schools and so provide as good education for country children as for city children.

Good roads have done away with the isolation of the farmer and his family.

Anything which contributes to the physical or mental wellbeing of the individual helps prevent disease and prolongs life.

Good roads have reduced the amount of dust and so have decreased the irritation to the nose, the throat, the eyes, and the ears. Dust catches disease germs and the less dust we inhale, the better off we are.

Good roads, either in the city or in the country, mean healthier, happier, and longer lives for all of us.

OPENING DEAF EARS

THE radio is the wonder of the present. It has practically annihilated space. It has increased a speaker's audience far beyond the capacity of any building on earth. It is estimated that over a million American citizens heard President Coolidge in his address before congress last December. This was probably the largest audience which has ever listened to one man. Yet it is small compared to what the audiences of the future may be. In a few years radios will be as common as telephones.

But the radio has done something else that is greater than annihilating distance or making all of our citizens one vast audience.

It has opened the ears of the deaf. Not all deaf persons can hear the radio, but some so deaf that they have not heard the human voice for years are able to hear over the radio with perfect ease. The New York League for the Hard of Hearing is so enthusiastic over the radio that it has equipped its clubrooms with radio apparatus carrying 24 head sets. Warren Pond, the president of the New York league, writing in the Volta Review, a magazine for the deaf, says, "When my radio was installed and, sitting in my home, I heard clearly the notes of a song, the tears came to my eyes. After living in silent land for 45 years, the spell was broken and I found a new heaven and a new earth."

Think what this means to the man or woman whose ability to hear has practically disappeared, to whom not only the human voice but all forms of music are forever silent. What is it that makes it possible for the ear, deaf to ordinary sounds, to respond to radio waves? Is there something about the radio wave that is different from the ordinary sound wave and that produces a vibration in the ear that is dead to ordinary sounds? We do not know, but we do know that the development of the radio and its widespread use has brought happiness to thousands of men and women who have been cut off from the world of sound for years. No one could anticipate that such a miracle would take place. The unexpected results of science are sometimes the most marvelous.

Florida's Big Bridge

Florida is building the longest automobile toll bridge in the world. Five and three-quarter miles in length, including causeways, this great span stretches across the upper arm of Tampa bay, connecting the winter resort of St. Petersburg with the commercial city of Tampa. Thirty-three miles—more than one-half—will be cut from the present distance between the two cities when the bridge is completed. It is estimated that the roadway will be thrown open to traffic by September 1.

Paper Currency

It has been computed that the cost to the United States of making a $1 bill is about as great as to make a $20 or a $10,000 bill. The expense is 1.3 cents each. The length of service varies in direct ratio to the value of the note. The $1 bill lasts little more than a year, it is estimated, a $10 bill lasts about four years, while a $10,000 bill obviously, seldom wears out.

A Hundred Per-cent American

A hundred per-cent American
Is that what you'd like to be?
Then give to the laws of your country
Your utmost loyalty

Anything less than this will be
Too weak to bear the the test.
A hundred per-cent American
Will give to his land his best.

It is not enough that your fathers
Were heroes at Lexington.
You, too, have a sacred duty.
You must be a worthy son.

Our country will live and prosper
So long as her sons are true
So long as her daughters are loyal
Our land will her strength renew

O, for strong men of vision
To guide our Ship of State,
Past the stormy seas, she is struggling through
To an ever glorious fate!

Have you Appendicitis and Don't Know It

Much so-called stomach trouble is really chronic appendicitis. This can often be relieved by simple glycerine, buckthorn bark, etc., as mixed in Adlerika. Most medicines act only on the lower bowel but Adlerika acts on BOTH upper and lower bowel, and removes all gasses and poisons. Brings out matter you never thought was in your system. HOW THIS WOMAN GOT STRENGTH

Put Up 300 Quarts Fruit, 500 Glasses Jelly and Took Care of Four Children

Norwalk, Iowa.—"I have been meaning for some time to write and tell you how much good your medicine has done me. When I started to take it I was almost bed fast and would have been in bed all the time if I had had any one to care for my children. There was so much swelling and pain that I could hardly take a step. I took seven bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and used Lydia E. Pinkham's Sanative Wash, and found that so healing. I am not entirely well yet for I was in bad shape when I started your medicine, but I am so much better that I am not afraid to recommend it, and I think if I keep on taking it, it will cure me. I have done my work all alone this summer, caring for four children, and I canned 300 quarts of fruit and made 500 glasses of jelly, so you see I must be better. I feel pretty good all the time and I am glad to tell others about the medicine."—Mrs. C. J. WENNERMARK, Box 141, Norwalk, Iowa.

Women can depend upon Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to relieve them from female troubles. For sale by druggists everywhere.

FOX VOWS VENGEANCE

OF COURSE, neither Madam Duck nor any of her family planned the downfall of Mr. Fox, but it was such an undignified tumble—as well as very unpleasant—that he vowed if he lived and had his health—and appetite—he would see to it that the duck family paid in full for his ridiculous accident.

Mr. Fox had long watched the pond where the ducks from a neighboring farm went every day for a swim. They were very plump-looking birds and many times Mr. Fox had craved one or more for his dinner.

It was not so easy to capture ducks on this pond because there was so much open space around it at one spot, and so, though he had tried, Mr. Fox had not been successful in making a catch.

The Fat Ducks Looked at Him.

But Mr. Fox had made up his mind to have one of those fat ducks or know the reason why. And so one morning he lay in wait where he could see the pond and watched for the ducks to take their daily swim.

Now there had been a very hard rain for several days which had done a great deal of damage. Mr. Fox did not know anything about this, and if he had he would not have thought that rain could damage a pond.

It had rained so fast and hard that even the ducks had stayed under cover, so when the sun came out every duck came waddling to the pond early for a swim. The pond seemed alive with ducks, Mr. Fox thought as he watched.

It was hard work for him not to make a dash in the open straight for the pond and make a spring in the midst of them, but Mr. Fox was wise from experience. So he stepped stealthily along, with eyes and ears alert, and himself hidden, until he came to the spot where the bushes were thick enough to hide him.

Mr. Fox was so keen upon getting his breakfast that he did not notice that he was creeping along on some very old boards half hidden in the muddy ground, nor did he see that one end of the boards was not on the ground at all but over the water.

This had once been a place where a boat was tied and the boards had been held up near the water ends by two small posts. One of these had fallen and the heavy rain of the past few days had washed away the earth that held the other, so that the weight of Mr. Fox was too much for the old post to hold up, and down it went, and with it Mr. Fox.

Into the mud he fell, splash! While all the fat ducks looked at him and quacked loudly as he scrambled up the bank and made off for some place where he could hide.

And this is the reason he vowed vengeance, for nothing could have convinced Mr. Fox that those ducks did not have it all planned to trap him.

"Anyway, they did not catch me," he muttered as he went along. "And if I am lucky enough to escape the gun of Mr. Man and have as good an appetite as I now have, I will make that family of ducks pay for this dirty trick. Look at my coat! All mud! It will take me all day to dry it!"

TALKING—ACTING

AS THE professor picked his way down the streaming street through the last violent torrents of the storm, he saw Eddie Clapper's little car standing at one almost flooded curb. The tiny runabout was packed with the squirming legs and romping bodies of seven children; they somersaulted over the wheel, they stood on their heads upon the seat, they crammed themselves into corners meant for packages and umbrellas. Then upon this confusion appeared Edward, snugly encased with a shiny rubber coat. Standing on the sidewalk at a yard's distance, Edward began to harangue the infants:

"Now you get right out of there. Don't you know that if one of you knocked the brake you might start off and kill yourselves? The engine's going and my chains aren't much use in this slippery weather. You have no right anyway to get into my car without permission. I might call the police if I wished and have you all arrested."

Here from the fruit shop where Edward had been buying peaches emerged a coatless, hatless Italian. One small boy he seized by the leg, another was pushed through the far side of the car, the rest evacuated of their own accord, and the Italian without a word went back to his shop leaving Edward in possession. With an expression of, "See what a fine boy am I," he got aboard in a leisurely way and drove off.

The next fall Eddie Clapper was appointed delegate to a national convention that was being held that year in a western city, and every night for two months Eddie talked at meetings of what the convention would accomplish. The professor went to hear him. Eddie was in his element as he beamed and smiled upon his already convinced audiences, and everybody had a fine time. As yet Eddie Clapper had never talked against opposition.

Then came the day of his departure. The special train that was to take the delegates to the convention had been made up, and the seats were beginning to fill. Several of his friends, among them the professor, had come to see Edward off. Quarter of an hour before starting time, he had not appeared. Ten minutes of, and he was not there. The clock hands advanced. No Edward. With three minutes left, the professor went off on a final search. Outside the station he found Eddie standing within a tight little circle of the other party. They were egging him on and drawing him out and Eddie, perfectly happy to be talking, stood there forgetful of his train and of action. Though the professor seized upon him they missed it, and for the whole session the incident afforded campaign material for the other side. But Eddie Clapper himself continued, as long as the professor knew him, to talk glibly and to act feebly.

"What's in a Name?"

By MILDRED MARSHALL

FACTS about your name; it's history; meaning; whence it was derived; significance; your lucky day and lucky jewel

LUCINDA

LUCINDA is a Seventeenth century product. It is the romantic version of Lucy, a name borne by many noble ladies of that period, whom poetry preferred to address as Lucinda, under the impression that the latter was more pleasing and popular than the simple Lucy.

Lucinda, of course, signifies light. Her origin is with the Latin word lux, meaning light, which gave rise to the favorite old Roman name Lucius, one born at daylight, or one of fair complexion, as some translations would have it.

The first feminine form which paved the way for the rise of Lucinda, was Lucia. This name belonged to a virgin martyr of Syracuse, whose name of light, being indicated by early painters by a lamp or by an eye, led to the legend that her beautiful eyes had been put out. Santa Lucia was the patroness of Neapolitan fishermen, and her name was soon adopted by the Normans.

The daughter of the earl of Marcia was baptized Lucia in the time of Edward the Confessor. France received her as Lucie through the House of Blois. One Lucie, a sister of Stephen, was among those lost in the White Ship. In England, Lucy was the favorite form, until the affectation of the Seventeenth century produced Lucinda.

Lucy Anne, another popular English version, had its counterpart in Italy in Luciana, and in France in Lucienne.

The amethyst is Lucy's talismanic gem. It will safeguard her from danger and contagion, and has a sobering effect upon a frivolous or high-strung temperament. Saturday is Lucinda's lucky day and 4 her lucky number.

The Why of Superstitions

By H. IRVING KING

REVENGE ON BACKBITERS

IF YOU have reason to believe that people are slandering you bite the corner of your apron and the backbiters will bite their tongues. This is for women. Another way, applicable to both sexes, is to pinch your ear and the person who is "talking about you" will bite his tongue. These charms work, of course, by sympathetic magic—like causes like. Your apron is a substitute of the slanderous tongue of your traducer: you bite it and the slanderer, by reason of the magic sympathy set up, responds by doing actually what you have done immitatively. Pinching the ear is a good simulation of biting the tongue and reacts upon the backbiter in the desired manner. It is, moreover an especially appropriate act of simulation in such cases because of the connection between tingling ears and "people talking about you"—a superstition which has already been dealt with in this series. These superstitions are widespread as are all the superstitions connected with sympathetic magic. It is worthy of note that while the doctrine of sympathetic magic was one of the earliest results of the efforts of primitive man to establish a relation between cause and effect so a belief in that same magic is the most universal of superstitions today.

Lesson for August 17

JESUS CLEANSES THE TEMPLE

LESSON TEXT—John 2:13-22.

GOLDEN TEXT—"My house shall be called the house of prayer."—Matt. 21:13.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Loves His Father's House.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus and the Temple Traders.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Right Conduct in God's House.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Reverence and Care for God's House.

I. Jesus Attending the Passover (v. 13).

He went up to Jerusalem very often to attend the various feasts. Beginning at the age of twelve this custom was habitual with Him to the end of His ministry. He was under the law and therefore He obeyed it (Deut. 16:16), but primarily He went up because it was His Father's house. It is important that all people from their youth up should make the attendance upon the house of God a habit of their lives.

II. The Temple Defiled (v. 14).

For the various sacrifices in the temple many oxen, sheep and doves were needed. Many persons came from distant parts of the land; therefore, it was impracticable to bring their sacrifices with them, so they brought money and bought the animals needed. This privilege the Lord had granted to them (Deut. 14:24-26). This exchange was necessary, but when evil men used it as an opportunity for gain it became an offense before God. If Christ were to come to many of our so-called houses of God today He would find them polluted in just as aggravating a way. His purging the temple courts shows the need of purity and order in all matters connected with divine worship.

III. Jesus Cleansing the Temple (vv. 15-17).

1. Driving Out the Merchants and Animals (v. 15). Being the Lord of the temple, the very Messiah who should come to His temple, He had the right to cleanse it, to drive out those who polluted it. It is not said that He used the scourge of cords but, at any rate, it was the symbol of authority.

2. His Command (v. 16). "Make not my Father's house an house of merchandise." Merchandise is legitimate in its place. Any use of the Lord's house other than to worship and honor Him is to make it a place of merchandise, to pollute it. There is great danger of a worldly spirit intruding into the domain of religion. Men who unite with the church for temporal interests, men who come to the house of worship with worldly matters uppermost in their thought, ministers who serve as professionals, men who bring their ill-gotten gains to help further the work of the Lord, in fact all who do not behave properly in the Lord's house, are defiling it and therefore all such must meet His judgment.

3. His Zeal (v. 17). He was so completely dominated by the passion to do the will of God that He unreservedly gave Himself to His work. This was according to the prophecy, "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." We should take His act as an example to us in the divine service and manifest commendable zeal. This reform did not prove permanent. A few years later He cleansed it again. This shows how quickly the human heart is under the control of sin. The only permanent reformation is that which is wrought in regeneration. The new birth is necessary.

IV. The Jews Demanding a Sign (vv. 18-22).

They demanded of Jesus that He show His authority for such behavior. He told them that the only sign that would be given was His death and resurrection. Destroying the temple and raising it up in three days refers to His crucifixion and resurrection. The resurrection is an unalterable proof of His divine sonship (Rom. 1:4). Jesus came forth from the grave of His own power. The Jews did not want a sign. They were only finding excuses for their wickedness. Men today who are demanding proof of Christ's divinity do not really wish the proof but are only trying to find excuses for their sins. Jesus had the ability to justify His ways before God and man. After the resurrection the disciples remembered the words of Jesus on this occasion. This shows that no sowing of the truth shall eventually fail. This ought to be a great comfort for Sunday school teachers and Christian workers.

Commands Clashed

Little Billy was visiting his grandmother and she was doing her best to give the small boy a good time.

The morning after his arrival she called one of the neighbor's children over to play with him.

"There, now," remarked grandma, in her kindliest tone. "You two can have a good time together."

But the two boys merely stared at each other across the room and grandma could not quite understand it.

"Come, now, children," she said. "Go on out into the garden, Billy, and strike an acquaintance."

"But, grandma," complained the little boy, "mother told me just before I came away not to fight."

Transjordania

Arabs of the Desert in Their City Costumes.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

The report from the Near East that Transjordania—situated as the name indicates just beyond the Jordan river from Palestine—is finding its independence less valuable than its people had thought it would be, brings this bit of desert land momentarily to world attention.

Transjordania is a new country—a mere fleck of desert and trouble on the world map. It is so new that few persons more than 500 miles from its borders know where or what the kingdom is. The Versailles pastry makers, like many cooks, had some dough left over after the world molds were filled, and this was one of the odd cookies.

Theoretically, it is an independent Arab kingdom. Actually, it belongs in Britain's pantry. The Arabs can call it theirs, but they must not nibble it or permit any other nation to do so. It has been rechristened both Transjordania and Kerak, the former to give western ears an inkling of its location, and the latter to soothe Mohammedan tastes.

When the leaders of the powers which rule the world sit in council, it seems quite easy to create new kingdoms. Take a river, a mountain range, a few pencil lines and different shades of ink on the map, and the task is accomplished—so far as the statesmen are concerned. New maps are printed and school children are studying them before the people in the country itself realize what has happened.

Transjordania was among the easiest. It served a purpose. Lying just east of the Jordan river, only a few miles from Jerusalem, it is a buffer between the British mandate in Palestine and the Arabs of the desert, and at the same time an irritant to the French mandate in Syria. It was molded with the confidence of enduring for ages.

Resembles Arizona City.

Amman is the capital of the new kingdom. That name alone might suggest that more than a new shade of ink on the maps and the discussions of distant statesmen are necessary to give a kingdom permanency. It has been a capital for ages.

The Ammonites, descendants of Lot, called it Rabbath Ammon when they ruled there. The creek which divides the village keeps its old name, Nahr Amman. Og's giant iron bed was a trophy in Rabbath Ammon.

Centuries later this city was the capital of one of the Greek republics of Decapolis; Ptolemy Philadelphus built an acropolis and renamed the place Philadelphia. The Romans and Crusaders came and it was one of their capitals. Others followed, until now it has new rulers.

Amman resembles Bisbee, Arizo., with its two main streets of Tombstone canyon and Brewery gulch—a creek in the valley with houses, shops, and footpaths struggling up the hillsides.

The main street winds around the base of the big hill which once was crowned by the massive Greek citadel, now a pile of ruined walls, fallen columns, and broken facades. In the center of the town, near the mosque, itself a ruin of the past, is the proscenium and arch of the later Roman theater.

Farther along, the road curves across the stone bridge, passes in front of the broken stone benches of the old Roman amphitheater, and disappears into the solitude of the desert.

The coping of the little bridge has been polished by the thousands who have loitered there since toiling backs first lifted the heavy stones into place. Under the moonlight the amphitheater stands out white and gaunt, concealing the scars of time. Croaking frogs and barks of distant dogs are the only sounds. A belated Bedouin gallops across the bridge, fading into a lengthening shadow in the distance.

Goats now are herded in the galleries through which the gay crowds passed to watch the sports of Roman days. In front of the Arab coffee shops marble columns from the Greek acropolis lie in the road for benches, on which dusty Bedouins sit to smoke and gossip.

The empires of the past which chose Amman as a capital built well, but they and their rulers are gone and forgotten. The mighty powers which ruled it are a memory, but its life goes on just the same. Now it is chosen again, the kingdom has been baptized with a new name, and the maps reprinted as if it all were new.

Through all the cycles of time, the Arab has changed least of all. Those of the town play their chess in the evening, as they have in quiet homes for hundreds of years. The Arabs claim they invented chess.

The Bedouin rides in from the desert, smokes his nargileh, drinks the cups of bitter coffee, and gallops out again into the void. As the seasons change, he folds his tents and moves with his herds of goats and camels. So long as the statesmen of Europe want to pay him for their pleasure in calling this or that portion of the desert a kingdom, it matters little to him. He knows nothing of maps and cares less. Should they attempt to make him pay, it would be different. Kingdom making would not be so easy.

Emir Abdullah Ibn Hussein is the nominal ruler of Transjordania. His court is the same as that of his forefathers—a cluster of tents in the desert, which he moves with the seasons.

By automobile it is only five hours from Jerusalem to Amman, but it is a change from the West to the East, and there are not many travelers on the road. Visitors are not generally welcomed in Transjordania. It is the threshold of Arabia, and once across its borders the law and authority of Europe are of the flimsiest.

An automobile can coast almost the entire distance from Jerusalem, along the steep hillsides, down into the valley of the Jordan. There is a glimpse of the Dead sea on the right, and the road turns straight across the plains toward Jericho.

As one rides through that simmering breathless valley, 1,200 feet below the level of the sea, the heroism of Joshua when he commanded the sun to stand still is impressed with stifling force. The farther end of the iron bridge across the Jordan is barricaded and a guard of soldiers stops the car. Unless word has been telephoned from the tented capital outside of Amman that a visitor in European clothes is to be permitted to pass, the car goes no farther.

From the river the road climbs out of the broiling valley to the higher fertile plain. In winter Abdullah moves his tents and royal court here, near the Jordan, though he seldom crosses into the British mandate. To hold his people, he must play the role of the desert Arab.

Caravans of camels, sniffing in alarm at the automobile, which the visitor of today is likely to use, jog along the road. Every man carries a long black-barreled rifle sticking up back of his ears—camel drivers, peasants working in the little fields, and even the boys watching the herds of goats on the hills. Transjordania is of the desert, where everybody is his own policeman.

Recently workmen have been leisurely clearing away the rubbish from the Roman amphitheater. Abdullah does not hope to restore it as in the days when shouting multitudes watched the games on the banks of the little creek, but the dirt and rubbish which now cover its battered artistic beauty will be removed.

Similar excavations will be made in the even larger ruins of Meshetta, a few miles from Amman. Other workmen are widening the streets and building roads in the country.

Area Only 16,000 Square Miles.

Amman is a station on the Hedjaz railroad, much used between Damascus and the South. However, the country has few funds for internal improvements, and the eternal conflict with the desert is hopeless. Its area is only 16,000 square miles, with a population of 400,000 exclusive of nomads.

The annual budget amounts to $1,040,000, against a revenue of $500,000. Great Britain makes up the difference, one of the many donations toward maintaining an Arab policy.

Transjordania is a haven for the exiles and fugitives from all the nearby territory. Under cover of night, they slip away from Damascus and other cities in the French mandate, cross the desert with the assistance of friendly tribes, until the long camel journey brings them into Transjordania.

Amman and the larger city of Es-Salt are full of men who have cheated the already-overcrowded French prisons. Few of them have abundant funds; all must be provided for. They are part of the brotherhood; poets, merchants, editors, army officers, students, lawyers, and men and women from every walk of life make up the number.

COOKED CEREALS ARE GOOD FOR CHILDREN

Encourage Use of Milk by Serving Each Day.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Thoroughly cooked cereals served to children once a day for the first course and once a day for dessert encourage the use of milk.

It is hard to give general rules for cooking cereals, for there are so many kinds, but it is safe to say that there is no danger of overcooking and much danger of undercooking them. Some grains need longer cooking than others—cornmeal, for example, needs at least three hours, and rice hardly more than half an hour. In general, whole grains, like whole wheat, or grains more or less finely broken, like cracked wheat, require longer cooking (three hours at least) than more finely ground grains, which should be cooked one hour at least. Breakfast foods made from grains with the outer coverings left on require more cooking than those with the outer covering removed—whole barley, for example, more than pearl barley. Many cereal foods, particularly the rolled and flaked types, have been partially cooked at the factory. These require less cooking in the home than those which have had no such treatment; but if they are to be served to children such cereals should be cooked at home for at least an hour. There are also cereal breakfast foods which have been still more thoroughly cooked at the factory, either by parching in addition to flaking or by some other special method. These are improved by putting them into the oven to crisp them.

Oatmeal, corn meal and many other granular cereals can be put directly into cold water and cooked satisfactorily in a double boiler without stirring, the method being particularly good in the case of corn meal, which is likely to be lumpy if stirred into hot water. A convenient method for cooking cereals is to mix with the usual quantity of water, bring to the boiling point, boil for three or four minutes, and then put into a fireless cooker and leave for ten or twelve hours.

The quantity of water required differs with the cereal. A cupful of rolled oats requires at least two cupfuls of water; oatmeal or corn meal, four cupfuls, and rice, three cupfuls.

A level teaspoonful of salt to a cupful of cereal will usually be right, but it is well to experiment a little with an unfamiliar cereal, since failure to salt mushes properly very often leads children to dislike them.

Any cereal may be cooked in milk, besides being served with it. Skim milk, which might otherwise be thrown away, may be used for the purpose. Rice, cooked in an uncovered double boiler, or in a pan in a very "slow" oven, can be made to absorb about six times its volume of skim milk. To cook a cupful of rice in this way instead of in water may be considered equivalent, so far as tissue-forming materials are concerned, to serving it with half a pound of lean beef.

Special Recipe Not Necessary to Make Fruitade.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Almost any slightly acid fruit juices can be used as the basis for a good summer drink. If desired a small amount of lemon may be added to intensify other fruit flavors. It is a practical plan to keep one or two bottles of water cooling in the ice box to dilute fruit juices readily. Ginger ale or a charged water, such as apollinaris, helps to convert a simple "fruitade" into a "punch" for occasions when a festive drink is appropriate, but the fruit juices, diluted with water only and well chilled, are very refreshing.

A special recipe is not necessary to make a fruitade. Any single predominant flavor may give it its name—raspberry, grape, pineapple, or orange; often four or five fruits are blended in approximately equal quantities. The flavor of peaches combines well with pear juice, pineapple, orange, and lemon; the juice of blackberries, raspberries, currants, blackcaps, grapefruit, limes, and plums can be used in any selected combinations. Lemon is necessary (unless limes are used for the purpose) to make the drink sufficiently acid to quench the thirst on a hot day.

The amount of water added depends somewhat on the kinds of fruit used, and also on the preference of the "taster." A preponderance of very acid juices—lemon or lime—will stand more dilution than the milder flavors. In general one part of water to one of mixed fruit juice can be tried at first, and more water added if it seems desirable. Tea may be substituted for about one-third of the water if the punch is made for adults; if children are to have any, it is better to omit the tea. The individual taste must be the guide in sweetening.

Sugar should be added to fruit drinks in the form of sirup, to get the best effect, as well as to use it in the most economical way. Two parts of sugar to one of water should be simmered for five minutes and then cooled before adding to the other ingredients. Sugar sirup can be prepared for several days at a time, and kept bottled in the refrigerator; left-over fruit juices may also be boiled with sugar and kept in a cold place for short periods until one has enough on hand to make up a good fruitade.

A thin slice or two of orange and lemon, some chopped bits of pineapple and banana, a few colorful berries, invite attention to the bowl or pitcher of punch, and a sprig of mint both flavors and completes it. Professional caterers often include a slice of cucumber. When a fruit punch must be prepared for a large gathering of people—a dance, a sociable, or a picnic—it is helpful to have exact ingredients specified. About 40 persons can be served by the following recipe, which is recommended by the United States Department of Agriculture.

Fruit Punch.

1 can grated pineapple.
3 cupfuls boiling water.
1 cupful freshly made, strong tea.
Juice of 6 lemons.
Juice of 10 oranges.
¼ teaspoonful salt.
1 quart grape, currant, loganberry, raspberry or strawberry juice.
2 pint bottles apollinaris or ginger ale.
2 pounds sugar boiled with 1 quart water for 5 minutes.
Ice to cool.

Cook the pineapple for 20 minutes in the boiling water and strain. Cool, add the remaining fruit juices, the tea, and the cooled sirup. It is better to make the punch a few hours ahead and let it stand closely covered on ice to chill and ripen. At serving time, add the apollinaris, ginger ale, or water to dilute to the strength desired. Garnish with thin slices of fruit and mint leaves.

Buttermilk Corn Meal Mush

White corn meal cooked in buttermilk makes a dish which resembles cottage cheese in flavor. It may be eaten hot, but is especially palatable when served very cold with cream. For this purpose it is sometimes molded in cups. In making it, allow 1 part of corn meal to 6 parts of buttermilk and 1 teaspoonful of salt to each cup of meal, according to the United States Department of Agriculture.

ROAST LAMB AND MUTTON ARE EXCELLENT

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Cold roast lamb and mutton, thinly sliced, are excellent, but the family may be tired of having the remains of the roast served that way, or the pieces may be too small to slice. In either event, these suggestions for utilizing this kind of left-over meat, offered by the United States Department of Agriculture, may be appreciated by the one who prepares the family meals.

Minced Lamb.

Chop pieces of lean, cold roast lamb fine. A pint of chopped meat will serve a family of five or six. Rub 1 tablespoonful each of butter and flour together; add ½ pint of milk, stir until boiling; add tablespoonful of finely chopped parsley, ½ teaspoonful salt, and a dash of cayenne. Add the meat and stand over hot water. Serve in a border of rice.

Cutlets of Cold Mutton.

From a leg of mutton, cooked rare, cut pieces about the size of an ordinary loin chop. These may be fried in a little fat, or dipped in egg and bread crumbs and fried in deep fat, or they may be brushed over with fat, and broiled. The result is more like meat cooked for the first time than the ordinary warmed-over meat. Cutlets so prepared may be served with any of the sauces served with chops.

SUFFERED TWELVE YEARS WITH STOMACH TROUBLE

"My recovery has been a surprise to myself and all my friends," recently declared Jacob Ferdinand, R. F. D. 2, Fond Du Lac, Wis., a prominent citizen of this city, in relating his remarkable experience with Tanlac.

"The suffering I went through from stomach trouble for 12 or 13 years simply can't be described. In my efforts to find relief I spent over one thousand dollars, but kept getting worse instead of better. A large part of two years I was laid up in bed and for four months of that time I couldn't get up at all.

"Finally I sent my daughter for a bottle of Tanlac with the result that I found immediate relief, and seven bottles made a well and happy man of me. I will gladly talk to anyone personally and answer all letters regarding my experience with Tanlac. It proved a godsend to me."

Tanlac is for sale by all good druggists. Accept no substitute. Over 40 million bottles sold.

Lucky Fisherman Got This

Taken from the waters of Lake Minnewanka, at Banff, a trout that weighed 37 pounds is now being mounted by local taxidermists and will be placed in the Banff museum. It is 42 inches long and 24 inches in circumference. Many good trout have been caught in the lake this year, but none so large as this. These lake trout in the Minnewanka waters are one of the mysteries of the Rockies. It is said to be the only lake in the mountains harboring this variety of fish.

EXCHANGE CLUB TO GET CHARTER

Arrangements are being made by the Exchange Club of Columbiana for an elaborate banquet to be served at the high school auditorium this evening at which time the charter from the national organization will be presented to club. Members of the club will have as their guests for the occasion their wives and they have invited the entire membership of the Exchange Club of Montevallo with their wives.

The work of organizing the local club was begun the last of March with the assistance of C. G. Smith and O. C. Carmichael, president and secretary, respectively, of the Montevallo Club. The requirement of the national organization is that a club must have a membership of 25 before it can receive its charter, and it was at the meeting of July 10 that this number was secured. Since that time the work of completing a permanent organization has been done and all the requirements of the national organization for full affiliation have been met.

In recognition of their work in helping to organize the local club the Montevallo club has been designated to present the charter and they will receive also a Service Pennant. Service pins will be presented to Mr. Smith and Mr. Carmichael in recognition of their individual efforts.

An appropriate musical program is being arranged for the evening by Mrs. Mildred White Wallace

County Court Continued Till October

On account of Circuit Court, the Grand Jury, the Board of Revenue convening on Monday, September the 1st, and realizing it will be impossible to hold a satisfactory term of the County Court, we have decided to continue all cases on the docket till the first Monday in October, 1924. Therefore, all parties interested in the County Court are hereby notified not to appear on the 1st day of September for the stated reasons.

We have no disposition to continue cases promiscuously, but realizing that it will be a hardship to hold this term, we are taking this step to avoid unnecessary trouble and expenses to the tax payers.

FARMERS OBSERVE CROP EXPERIMENTS

A number of interested farmers joined County Agent A. A. Lauderdale recently in a tour over a large section of the county to study some experiments that are being carried on with various crops.

Leaving Columbiana the party visited first the farms of T. J. Stone and J. T. McEwen in the Fourmile community where they saw on each farm a field of corn planted after hairy vetch. From there they went to the farm of J. W. Clark to see a demonstration in the usse of fertilizer with cotton. Mr. Clark had several plots, each fertilized after different methods. The plot on which fertilizer was applied at the rate of 1400 pounds to the acre was exceptionally good. The plot that had 700 pounds to the acre was also very good.

The farm of S. A. Woolf, near Wilsonville, was visited next to see a pasture demonstration. Mr. Woolf planted his pasture in the spring, sowing carpet grass, Dallis grass and lespedeza. He had a good stand of different grasses, especialiy of lespedeza, and his cattle were having good grazing.

From here the party went to C. M. Mauldin's farm and got there in time for a barbecue that was being enjoyed by about 75 people, most of them living on the Mauldin farm. Every good thing including besides the barbecue, pies, cakes and ice cream, was served for dinner. After dinner some time was spent in studying experiments Mr. Mauldin is carrying on with Beggar Weed and Kudzu for hay and in looking over some fine cotton fertilized at the rate of 700 to 800 pounds to the acre.

This was the first tour of its kind possibly to be made in Shelby county and members of the party were enthusiastic over what they saw. It is Mr. Lauderdale's plan to organize other parties later on and visit demonstrations that are being carried on in other parts of the county.

ROAD BUILDING CONTRACTS LET $600,000 TO BE SPENT IMMEDIATELY ON ROAD PROJECTS IN VARIOUS PARTS OF THE STATE.

Montgomery.—Road building contracts totalling over $600,000, were awarded last week by the state highway commission. The counties in which this work is to be carried out are Dallas, Washington and Chilton.

Contract for the road in Dallas county, which will extend from the Perry county line a distance of eight miles toward Centreville, and will be of gravel construction, went to E. P. Toulmin, of Mobile, at $64,882.12. At $32,129.46, B. B. Smith, of Montgomery, got the contract for the building of bridges on the same project.

C. D. Fountain, of Hattiesburg, Miss. was awarded the contract for grading the new road in Washington county, extending from the Mobile county line to Carson, 22 miles. The commission let to E. P. Houlmin, of Mobile, the contract for surfacing the road with gravel at $159,246.50. Contract for the bridges was awarded to Ed Petsus, of Montgomery, for $31,842.21.

J. H. and J. B. Miller, of Baconton, Ga., received the contract for surfacing with concrete the 17.45 miles of road in Chilton county, extending from the Shelby line southward. The price is $271,244.14.

Proposal for location of the Grove Hill-Thomasville road in Clarke county via the eastern route which would bring the road through Fulton, was made by a delegation of citizens from Clarke who appeared before the commission. The commission advised that a survey is now being made of the proposed eastern route in order to determine whether that route or the one already established is the most desirable.

A delegation of citizens from Tuscaloosa county headed by Judge Manly Foster and Probate Judge Woolsey Finnell, presented a request for construction of a road across the county from the Jefferson county line to the Greene county line, via the city of Tuscaloosa. The length of the proposed road, 11 miles of which have already been graveled and now under maintenance by the state, is 47 miles.

Members of the delegation stated they knew the commission's program for road building for 1924-2555 is already fixed, but asked that the road proposed be included in the next program. Recently the county of Tuscaloosa has authorized issuance of $600,000 of bonds for road building, with the provision that proceeds from the sale of the bonds are to be apportioned to certain roads and that none of the money is to be spent unless the state and government participate on a two-thirds basis. Under such an arrangement, the state would pay a third of the cost of the work, the federal government a third and the county a third. Chairman of the commission, John A. Rogers, promised that the matter will be considered.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

Announcement was made in Gadsden that Otto Agricola, of that city, and the Hammond Byrd company, at Birmingham, had sold their interests in three soil pipe plants, the Coosa, Gadsden and Agricola plants, for a consideration of approximately $2,000,000. The purchaser is the Anniston Pipe and Foundry company, which was recently organized to take over several pipe shops at Anniston. It is owned and officered by former Gov. T. E. Kilby, C. A. Hamilton, W. F. Johnston, Whitfield Clark, of Anniston, and William Byrd, of Chicago. The sale also includes the Talladega Pipe company and the Imperial Pipe company, of Bessemer. The anniston concern now has 13 plants, their purchase representing an investment of about $4,000,000. Mr. Agricola will retire as manager of the local shops.

Announcement was made that the state highway department is about to enter into contract with Montgomery county, whereby the state will take over the Carter Hill road and Mount Meigs road and make them a part of the state highway system. The county will agree to put the roads in condition acceptable to the state for which it will be paid $25,000 by the state. The mileage of the two roads is forty-three.

Bankruptcy petitions for the Interstate Casualty company, of Birmingham and St. Louis, have been filed in Montgomery and St. Louis and A. W. Briscce, former state insurance commissioner of Alabama, has been appointed receiver to take charge of a $$250,000 deposit in a Montgomery bank, and former Supreme Court Judge Revel, of St. Louis, to direct affairs in Missouri.

Diversion through Prattville of the Autauga County link in the Montgomery-Birmingham highway has been finally and definitely refused by the United States Bureau of Public Roads, according to Chairman John A. Rogers, of the state highway commission.

Nearly 800 members of the Madison County Farm Bureau and their friends made an inspection trip to Muscle Shoals on a special train.

The store of M. A. Morrow was robbed of between $300 and $400 worth of merchandise at Guntersville.

An experiment in highway work, which is expected to determine whether treatment of sand-clay road surfaces with oil will do away with dust and mud, and at the same time prove as cheap, as renewing a sandy-clay surface, is now being carried out by the state highway department near Banks, Pike county, on the Bee Line highway. At this point oil is being placed on about a mile of sand-clay road. The oil was donated by the Standard Oil company. It may be found that by oiling sand-clay roads will maintain them adequately at less or no greater expense than resurfacing every 12 months, at the same time doing away with dust and mud.

For the first time in her history Alabama has passed the billion-dollar mark in taxable values, according to tabulations made by the state tax commission. This represents a large increase over the 1923 assessment and will result in swelling to the total receipts from ad valorem taxes. Beginning right after October 1 the special agents will start on the quadrennial appraisement of all property in the state, and it is believed that when they are through the present billion-dollar mark will have been largely exceeded.

With a strength of more than 1,600 men at Camp McClellan, Anniston, Alabama national guard has more men in training this year than any year since the world war, it was announced by Captain U. N. James, regimental adjutant of the Alabama guard. The organization of the regiment is working more efficiently and with less friction than ever before, and the morale of the men is at its highest peak, Captain James stated. With all these indications, it is pointed out that this season should prove to be the most successful in the history of the Alabama guardsmen.

Morgan county asphalt has been used for building a short section of the Somerville pike just out of the Twin Cities near the Bee Line highway. In a few hours time, after the raw asphalt had been ground, it was crushed and immediately placed on the pike and ten heavy teams were driven over it. To all appearances, the new product had made a substantial roadway in a few hour's time.

Rodney Thompson, well known young man of Hartselle, son of Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Thompson, was almost instantly killed at a point near Lacon when his car in which he and Roy Penn, of Cullman, were headed toward Hartselle, turned over, breaking young Thompson's neck. The other young man was also pinned beneath the car, and was badly bruised.

After thirty hours of search, sheriff's officers have been unable to obtain any trace of Herbert Julias, alias James Dorsey, negro, who is charged with the murder and robbery of William A. Sinnreich, distributor of soft drinks, while the two were returning from Tuskegee to Montgomery on a truck. All clues have been closely followed but have been unavailing.

W. M. Carter was killed and his 14-year-old son severely injured when the automobile in which they were riding was struck by an Atlantic Coast Line train on the Snowdoun road, near Montgomery. There were no eye witnesses to the accident. The automobile was demolished.

Judge O. Kyle and Judge James E. Horton of the circuit court of Madison county have cleared up a supposed misunderstanding on account of the law as given by them to the special grand jury recently in session here, according to correspondence which has passed between the two officials.

John Milton, ax slayer, apparently has made good his escape and is believed to have put many miles between himself and the scene of his crime, which occurred in Jefferson county, Chief Deputy Henry S. Hill said at the close of the six day searching for him.

Papers of incorporation were filed with the secretary of state by the Montgomery Cotton Oil company, a Montgomery concern with $150,000 capital stock, of which $120,000 has been paid in. John F. Stevens, E. T. Allen and Fred E. Calvern are the incorporators.

Just at the time when everybody began to sit back and congratulate Etowah and adjoining counties on the prospects of an unusually large cotton crop, news came in that the red spider is doing much damage in large areas of the district.

Louis Gavan, negro, of Smite Mines, has confessed to the shooting of John B. Fancher, proprietor of the Fancher Bonding company, of Birmingham, on the Oxmoor road, according to Assistant Solicitor Jim Long and Chief Deputy Henry S. Hill.

Voters of Muscle Shoals city met at the city hall and nominated the following for mayor and aldermen; Mayor, Robert Houston; aldermen, George Harris, F. J. Gusman, O. F McGuire, J. F. Green and George Vaughan.

Mobile shippers and exporters are receiving letters from the United States shipping board asking for cooperation in directing foreign shipments by American vessels.

Invitations to the eighth annual convention of the Alabama Merchants' Association have been mailed throughout the state by J. L. Hicks, president of the organization.

Miss Mamie Ruth Davis, of Ramer Montgomery county, has been appointed secretary to the state superintendent of education

THE KITCHEN CABINET

(©, 1924, Western Newspaper Union.)

WEEKLY MENU SUGGESTIONS

Improve your kitchens, making them bright with sunlight if possible, if not bright with sunny paint. The room where so much time is spent in the preparation of food should be as attractive as it is possible to make it. Do you have a window out of which you may enjoy the view, over your kitchen sink? It will help amazingly in shortening the time of dishwashing.

SUNDAY—Breakfast: Orange, muffins. Dinner: Leg of lamb with dressing, peach ice cream. Supper: Omelet, rhubarb sauce.

MONDAY—Breakfast: Ripe pears, oatmeal and top milk. Dinner: Larded liver, baked calves' hearts, stuffed; lettuce salad. Supper: Sliced roast lamb.

TUESDAY—Breakfast: Bread crumb pancakes. Dinner: Hungarian goulash, head lettuce salad. Supper: Angel food.

WEDNESDAY—Breakfast: Cherries, coffee cake, coffee. Dinner: Stuffed calves hearts, raw carrot salad. Supper: Cabbage salad.

THURSDAY—Breakfast: Waffles, coffee. Dinner: Swiss steak, riced potatoes, apple pie, cheese. Supper: Baked hash, green onions.

FRIDAY—Breakfast: Muskmellon, cereal with cream. Dinner: Boiled fish, horseradish sauce; steamed brown bread. Supper: Egg and peas omelet.

SATURDAY—Breakfast: Grapes, corn flakes, cream. Dinner: Boiled mutton, caper sauce; hot seasoned rice. Supper: Baking powder biscuit, blackberries.

Peach Ice Cream.

Remove the skins and pits and put through a ricer enough ripe peaches to make one and one-half cupfuls of pulp. Add the juice of a lemon, one and one-fourth cupfuls of sugar and place in the freezer. When well chilled add a pint of cream and freeze as usual. Serve in halves of chilled melons.

Cabbage Salad.

Shred a hard head of cabbage very fine, cover with iced water and when crisp drain and dry. Add salt and enough thick sweet cream to moisten the cabbage well, sprinkle with sugar and add a dash of vinegar. Mix well and serve well chilled.

If you don't believe in yourself, your work and your future, don't expect anyone else to have confidence in you. Enthusiasm is your best asset. Use it.—Lloyd.

GOOD THINGS FOR THE TABLE

A dainty salad is always an acceptable dish at any season, and especially during the warm weather.

Favorite Apple Salad.—Core six red apples and cook them without removing the skins, in gently boiling water until tender, but not broken. Turn the apples often with a skimmer, that they may cook evenly. Remove to a plate, carefully take off the skins and scrape off the red pulp adhering to the inside of the skins, replacing it on the cheeks of the apple. Let chill; arrange on heart leaves of lettuce. Beat one cupful of heavy cream stiff, add one-fourth of a cupful of sugar, one teaspoonful of lemon juice, one-fourth of a teaspoonful of salt, one-fourth cupful of pecan meats broken into bits and one-fourth cupful of minced, tender celery. Serve on the apples. Garnish the tops with sprigs of white celery and halves of pecan meats.

Empress Rolls.—Take the long shaped bakers' rolls, cut in half crosswise, scoop out the soft crumb and fill the cavities with the following mixture: One cucumber, peeled and chopped, one teaspoonful of grated horseradish, one dessert spoonful of cream, and as much mayonnaise as you like, with salt to taste. Press in the filling with a knife.

Peanut Butter and Marmalade Sandwiches.—Spread one slice of bread with peanut butter, the second slice with orange marmalade, and press the slices together. Cut into rounds or other fancy shapes.

Stuffed Dates.—Remove the stones from dates and insert small portions of peanut butter into the cavities. Roll in granulated sugar and chill before using.

Salmon and Pea Salad.—Take a can of salmon, removing all skin and bones, add an equal amount of cooked peas, season well and serve with a highly seasoned boiled dressing to which a chopped sour pickle has been added. Serve on head lettuce with plenty of good dressing for a garnish.

Lobster, Southern Style.—Cut two boiled lobsters into halves lengthwise, remove the meat and cut into cubes. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter; when bubbling add one slice of onion chopped fine, one tablespoonful of parsley chopped fine, one-fourth of a teaspoonful of mustard; stir while cooking five minutes. Add two tablespoonfuls of flour when bubbling, one cupful of rich milk and cook until boiling. Add the lobster meat, return to the shells, sprinkle with grated cheese and bake fifteen minutes in a hot oven.

FLANNELS HAVE FOUND FAVOR; FOR THE AUTUMN SCHOOLTIME

OF DISTINCTLY youthful treatment and in a range of delightfully original colors are the regulation straight-line frocks styled for office and schoolroom wear. In fact, these frocks of simplicity are the sort which make instant appeal to women of practical affairs in general.

Flannel is a favorite medium for the formal daytime frock, in such out-of-the-ordinary shades as russet, mauve, powder blue, mauve, reindeer, and plain as can be, accenting the beltless vogue.

All good things must come to an end, even summer vacations, which at this moment means to mothers and daughters the immediate staging of that annual prologue which always precedes "first day of school." As usual the outstanding theme for this regular autumn program is outfitting daughter for school.

It is a fortunate circumstance that soft wine tones, brilliant red and greens on the reseda and Lanvin order. Because of the prevailing simplicity in styles these high shades do not make the wearer seem conspicuous.

Wearable for sports and especially desirable as a school type for autumn is the girlish model here pictured. It is developed in peach-color flannel, with pintucks detailing vestee and pockets. Clusters of pearl buttons and collars and cuffs of white linen complete this frock

Among the distinctive features stressed in the youthful flannel frock smart vogue favors the simple cloth dress this fall. It makes the problem of school apparel so much easier to solve. Furthermore, fashion decrees that the youthful frock of flannel, rep, poiret twill or serge, be enhanced with daintiest lingerie accessories. A touch of lace, a bit of embroidery, what vast possibilities do these trifles of feminine finery suggest! A swift transformation in one's costume may be accomplished by simply changing one's collars or cuffs or adding a lace slipover bib. Some of these new laces and tucked net bib effects have become so is that of the bishop sleeve. This fulled-in-to-the-wrist type gives opportunity for trimming effects in that the wristbands may be tucked, embroidered and otherwise designed.

The arrival of the directoire style adds zest to the designing of the severely plain cloth street frock. Tight-fitting sleeves, conventional revers, buttons, many of them, and long, severe lines with interesting capelets, interpret this mode.

Competing with soft woolens for supremacy in matter of tailored one-piece frocks are heavy ribbed silks, bengaline being of outstanding style importance. Also heavy crepe satins and marocain crepes continue in favor. These are made up as straight elongated in the process of design they fall quite below the front of the waistline, slipping under the girdle.

The fact that long tight-fitting sleeves are the fashion augurs well for the future of fanciful detachable cuffs, such as are pictured in this group of modish lingerie sets. That novelty cuffs are to feature this fall is told at a glance.

Eyelet embroidery sets, such as that shown above to the left in this collection, are especially approved by the mode. Not always is this openwork white or ecru, for some of the most attractive sets are in delft blue, orange or rose.

MARY SUCCEEDS ON MAIN STREET

By LAURA MILLER

HOSTESS OF TORCH-LIGHT FISHING LAKE

Lac du Flambeau, Wis., seemed in 1915 a very deserted little Main Street. Originally it was a sandy trail through great white pine trees, from Indian fishing village to Indian hunting grounds. Then French voyageurs in search of beaver followed it and translated its Indian name, Was-Wah-Ganing, "Near-the-Torch-Light-Fishing Lake," into their own tongue. Followed Americans who persuaded the descendants of Hiawatha to make Lac du Flambeau the center of a permanent reservation. But year after year, generation after generation, say the old men, the trail remained the same pine-shadowed, moccasin-printed highway.

Nineteen fifteen saw it sun-bitten, dusty, desolate, running through a devastated country past a wrecked saw mill, beyond rows of unpainted, deserted cabins that mill workers had used while the company stripped the reservation of its timber. One painted house stood apart at the end of the trail where the lake waves up to meet it. One of the two remaining clumps of trees stood near. One of the few spirits which had absorbed from ruthless business the good to be learned and avoided the ill, dwelt in the painted house. The one pair of eyes that saw the green beauty that would soon clothe the land, and the fish that begged for fishermen in the long chain of lakes, belonged to the dweller in the painted house.

There was question from her husband when Mrs. Benedict Gauthier proposed to put all the family savings into a summer hotel for fishermen and their families. There was opposition from the Indian tribe, only to be overcome by long and patient council. There was argument even from some of her most progressive advisers when it became known that she wanted an architect to design the hotel and proposed a highly paid man cook and maids in crisp black and white uniform.

But the architect and the cook and the maids became realities. The Indians found guiding fishermen both lucrative and pleasant as a change from their farming. Of the many guests who drift back to Lac du Flambeau summer after summer, not a few have become fast friends of both Mr. and Mrs. Gauthier, friends such as would never have crossed the door of a couple marooned in the painted house on the lonely trail.

The final dramatic touch in the story to many folk lies in the fact that Mrs. Gauthier, like the village, has an Indian name, given her by a pal godmother, in a wigwam, in token of her own Ojibway blood.

"YOU FIGHT WELL, ZEN"

SYNOPSIS. — Transley's hay-cutting outfit, after stacking 2,000 tons, is on its way to the big Y.D. ranch headquarters. Transley is a master of men and circumstances. Linder, foreman, is substantial, but not self-assertive. George Drazk, one of the men, is an irresponsible chap who proposes to every woman he meets. Transley and Linder dine with Y.D. and his wife and daughter Zen. Transley resolves to marry Zen. Y.D. instructs Transley to cut the South Y.D., "spite o' h—l an' high water" and a fellow named Landson. Drazk proposes to Zen and is neatly rebuffed. Transley pitches camp on the South Y.D. and finds Landson's outfit cutting hay. Denison Grant, Landson's manager, notifies Transley that he is working under a lease from the legal owners and warns Transley off. All of which means war. Y.D. and Zen ride to the South Y.D. Zen is a natural vamp, not yet halter-broke and ripe for mating. Y.D. has taken a liking to Transley. Zen holds Transley off and encourages Linder. Zen enjoys the prospect of a race between Transley and Linder for her favor, but secretly laughs at both. She has another and more serious encounter with Drazk. Y.D. mowing machines are ruined by iron stakes set in the grass. Zen prevents open war with Landson. Transley half-way proposes and is turned off. Drazk resolves to burn out the rival outfit. Fire blazes up in the Landson stacks. The Y.D. outfit hastens to aid the enemy. Zen rides off alone to help.

CHAPTER V—Continued.

Then I'll change his style of archi-ture the first time I run into him," d Y.D. savagely. "Zen is too young think of such a thing, anyway."

She will always be too young to nk of such a thing, so far as Drazk his type is concerned," Transley rned. "But suppose—Y.D., to be te frank, suppose I suggested—"

Transley, you work quick," said D. "I admit I like a quick worker. t just now we have a fire on our nds."

By this time they had reached the p. Transley gave his instructions a few words, and then turned to down to Landson's. They had e only a few hundred yards when pulled his horse to a stop.

Transley!" he exclaimed, and his e was shaking. "What do you ll?"

The contractor drew up and sniffed air. When he turned to Y.D. his e what white.

Smoke, Y.D.!" he gasped. "The d has changed!"

t was true. Already low clouds of ke were drifting overhead like a ken veil. The erratic foothill wind, ch a few minutes before had been ing down the valley, was now ing back up again. Even while took in the situation they could the hot breath of the distant fire e against their faces.

Well, it's up to us," said Transley ely. "We'll make a fight of it. any speed in that nag of yours?"

ut waiting for an answer he put to his horse and set forward ild gallop into the smoke.

lle down the line he found that had already gathered his forces ld out a plan of defense. The from the South Y.D. to the was about four miles wide, and e full breadth of it was now the fire from Landson's fields. was no natural fighting line; hall not so much as a buffalo o work against. But he was starting back-fires at intervals yards, allotting three men to re. A back-fire is a fire start-the purpose of stopping anoth-ually a road, or a plowed strip, a cattle path, is used for a On the windward side of this back-fire is started and al-to eat its way back against d until it meets the main fire is rushing fotward with the nd chokes it out for lack of fuel. A few men, stationed along a furrow or a trail, can keep the small back-fire from jumping it, although they would be powerless to check the momentum of the main fire.

This was Linder's position, except that he had no furrow to work against. All he could do was tell off men with sacks and horse blankets soaked in the barrels of water to hold the back-fire in check as best they could. So far they were succeeding. As soon as the fire had burned a few feet the forward side of it was pounded out with wet sacks. It didn't matter about the other side. It could be allowed to eat back as far as it liked; the farther the better.

"Good boy, Lin!" Transley shouted, as he drew up and surveyed operations. "She played us a dirty trick, didn't she?"

Linder looked up, red-eyed and coughing. "We can hold it here," he said, "but we can never cross the valley. The fire will be on us before we have burned a mile. It will beat around our south flank and lick up everything!"

Transley jumped from his horse. He seized Linder in his arms and literally threw him into the saddle. "You're played, boy!" he shouted in his foreman's ear. "Ride down to the river and get into the water, and stay there until you know we can win!"

Then Transley threw himself into the fight. As the men said afterwards, Linder fought like a wildcat, but Transley fought like a den of lions. When the wagon galloped up from the river with barrels of water Transley seized a barrel at the end and set it bodily on the ground. He sprang into the wagon, shouting commands to horses and men. A hundred yards they galloped along the fighting front; then Transley sprang out and set another barrel on the ground. In this way, instead of having the men all coming to the wagon to wet their sacks, he distributed water along the line. Then they turned back, picked up the empty barrels, and galloped to the river for a fresh supply. So they had the first mile secure. The back-fires had all met; the forward line of flames had all been pounded out; the rear line had burned back until there was no danger of it jumping the burned space. Then Transley picked up his kit and rushed it to a new front farther south. At intervals of a hundred yards he started fires, holding them in check and beating out the western edge as before.

But his difficulties were increasing. He was farther from the river, and took longer to get water. One of the barrels fell off and collapsed. Some of the men were playing out. The horses were wild with excitement and terror. The smoke was growing denser and hotter. Men were coughing and gasping through dry, seared lips.

"You can't hold it, Transley! You can't hold it!" said one of the men.

Transley hit him from the shoulder. He crumpled up and collapsed.

A mile and a half had been won safe, but the smoke was suffocatingly thick and the roar of the on-coming fire rose above the shouts of the workers. Up galloped the water wagon, made a sharp lurch and turned, the front wheel collapsed with the axle. The wagon went down at once, and the barrels were dumped on the ground.

The men looked at Transley. For one moment he surveyed the situation. "Is there a chain?" he demanded. There was.

"Hitch on to the tire of this front wheel. Some of you men yank the hub out of it. Others pull grass—like h—l was after you!"

They pulled. In a minute or two Transley had the rim of the wheel flat on the ground, with the chain hitched to it and a little pile of dry grass inside. Then he set fire to the little pile of grass and started the team slowly along the battle line. As they moved the burning grass fired the rim set fire to the grass on the prairie underneath; the rim kept on rolling, rubbed it out again as it came around, and the men were able to keep the fire remained in check, but as he lengthened his line Transley had to send more and more men to beat out the flames. The fire, and had fewer to pull grass. The sacks were too wet to burn; he had to have grass to feed his moving fire-spreader.

At length he had only a teamster and himself, and his fire was going out. Transley whipped off his shirt, rolled it into a little heap, set fire to it, and ran along beside the rim, fanning the little moving circle of grass inside.

It was the teamster, looking back, who saw Transley fall. He had to drop the lines to run to his assistance, and the horses, terrified by smoke and fire and the excitement of the fight, immediately bolted. The teamster took Transley in his arms and half carried, half dragged him into the safe area behind the back-fires. And a few minutes later the main fire, checked on its front, swept by on the flank and raced on up through the valley.

In riding down to the assistance of Mrs. Landson Zen found herself suddenly caught in an eddy of smoke. She did not realize at the moment that the wind had turned; she thought she must have ridden into the fire area. To avoid the possibility of being cut off by fire, and also for better air, she turned her horse to the river. All through the valley were billows of smoke, with here and there a reddish-yellow glare marking the more vicious sections of flame. Vaguely, at times, she thought she caught the shouting of men, but all the heavens seemed full of roaring.

When Zen reached the water the smoke was hanging low on it, and she drove her horse well in. Then she swung down the stream, believing that by making a detour in this way she could pass the wedge of fire that had interrupted her and get back on to the trail leading to Landson's. She was coughing with the smoke, but rode on in the confidence that presently it would lift.

It did. A whip of wind raised it like a strong arm throwing off a blanket. She sat up and breathed freely. The hot sun shone through rifts in the canopy of smoke; the blue sky looked down serene and unmoved by this outburst of the elements. Then as Zen brought her eyes back to the water she saw a man on horseback not forty yards ahead. Her first thought was that it must be one of the fire fighters, driven like herself to safety, but a second glance revealed George Drazk. For a moment she had an impulse to wheel and ride out, but even as she smothered that impulse a tinge of color rose in her cheeks that she should for a moment have entertained it. To let George Drazk think she was afraid of him would be utmost humiliation.

She continued straight down the stream, but he had already seen her and was headed her way. In the excitement of what he had just done Drazk was less responsible than usual.

"Hello, Zen!" he said "Mighty decent of you to ride down an' meet me like this. Mighty decent, Zen!"

"I didn't

[illegible]

[illegible] other. More [illegible] they went under water together and came up half choking.

Zen was not a good swimmer, but she would gladly have broken away and taken chances with the current. Once on land she would be at his mercy. She was using her head frantically, but could think of no device to foil him. It was not her practice to carry weapons; her whip had already gone down the stream. Presently she saw a long leather thong floating out from the saddle of Drazk's horse. It was no larger than a whiplash; apparently it was a spare lace which Drazk carried, and which had worked loose in the struggle. It was floating close to Drazk.

"Don't let me sink, George!" she cried frantically, in sudden fright. "Save me! I won't fight any more."

"That's better," he said, drawing her up to him. "I knew you'd come to your senses."

Her hand reached the lash. With a quick motion of the arm, such as is given in throwing a rope, she had looped it once around his neck. Then, pulling the lash violently, she fought herself out of his grip. He clutched at her wildly, but could reach only some stray locks of her brown hair which had broken loose and were floating on the water.

She saw his eyes grow round and big and horrified; saw his mouth open and refuse to close; heard strange little gurgles and chokings. But she did not let go.

"When you insulted me this morning I promised to settle with you; I did not expect to have the chance so soon."

His head had gone under water. . . . Suddenly she realized that he was drowning. She let go of the thong, clutched her horse's tail, and was pulled quickly ashore.

Sitting on the gravel, she tried to think. Drazk had disappeared; his horse had landed somewhat farther down. . . . Doubtless Drazk had drowned. Yes, that would be the explanation. Why change it?

Zen turned it over in her mind. Why make any explanations? It would be a good thing to forget. She could not have done otherwise under the circumstances; no jury would expect her to do otherwise. But why trouble a jury about it?

"He got what was coming to him," she said to herself presently. She admitted no regret. On the contrary, her inborn self-confidence, her assurance that she could take care of herself under any circumstances, seemed to be strengthened by the experience.

She got up, drew her hair into some kind of shape, and scrambled a little way up the steep bank. Clouds of smoke were rolling up the valley. She did not grasp the significance of the fact at the first glance, but in a mo-

Half Hour's Hard Riding Brought Her to Lint's.

[illegible]t it impacted home to her. The [illegible]d had changed! Her help now [illegible]ld be needed, not by Mrs. Land-[illegible], but probably at their own camp. [illegible] sprang on her horse, recrossed [illegible] stream, and set out on a gallop for [illegible] camp. On the way she had to [illegible] through one thin line of fire, [illegible]ch she accomplished successfully. [illegible]rough the smoke she could dimly [illegible] Transley's gang fighting the back-[illegible]s. She knew that was in good [illegible]ds, and hastened on to the camp. [illegible]had had prairie experience enough [illegible]now that in hours like this there is [illegible]ost sure to be something or some-[illegible]y, in vital need, overlooked.

[illegible]e galloped into the camp and [illegible]d only Tompkins there. He had [illegible]ady run a little back-fire to pro-[illegible] the tents and the chuck-wagon.

[illegible]low goes it, Tompkins?" she [illegible]d, bursting upon him like a courier [illegible] battle.

[illegible]ll set here, ma'am," he answered. [illegible] set an' safe. But they'll never [illegible] the main fire; it'll go up the val-[illegible]h—l-scootin',—beggin' your pardon, [illegible]am."

[illegible]Anyone live up the valley?"

[illegible]There is. There's the Lints—[illegible]tters about six miles up—it was [illegible] them I got the cream an' fresh [illegible] you was good enough to notice, [illegible]am. An' there's no men folks [illegible]t; jus' Mrs. Lint an' a young herd [illegible]ittle Lints; least, that's all was [illegible]e las' night."

[illegible]I must go up," said Zen, with in-[illegible]t decision. "I can get there before [illegible] fire, and as the Lints are evidently [illegible]mers there will be some plowed [illegible]d, or at least a plow with which to [illegible]n a furrow so that we can start a back-fire. Direct me."

Tompkins directed her as to the way, and, leaving a word of explanation to be passed on to her father, she was off. A half hour's hard riding brought her to Lint's, but she found that this careful settler had made full provision against such a contingency as was now come about. The farm buildings, implements, stables, everything was surrounded, not by a fire-guard, but by a broad plowed field. Mrs. Lint, however, was little less thankful for Zen's interest than she would have been had their little steading been in danger. She pressed Zen to wait and have at least a cup of tea, and the girl, knowing that she could be of little or no service down the valley, allowed herself to be persuaded. In this little harbor of quiet her mind began to arrange the day's events. The tragic happening at the river was as yet too recent to appear real; had it not been for the touch of her wet clothing Zen could have thought it all an unhappy dream of days ago. She reflected that neither Tompkins nor Mrs. Lint had commented upon her appearance. The hot sun had soon dried her outer apparel, and her general disheveled condition was not remarkable on such a day as this.

Having Killed Drazk, what is Zen going to do about it?

HOW TO KEEP WELL

WHAT IS APPENDICITIS?

ONE of the favorite subjects for jokes on the part of our present-day humorists is appendicitis.

According to these gentlemen, appendicitis is a recently discovered disease which was invented for the purpose of giving surgeons a remunerative occupation.

"How does it happen," asks the newspaper humorist, "that our grandparents never had appendicitis?"

Bless your hearts! They did, just as people do nowadays, but they died of it. In the majority of cases they never got well to tell the story.

Appendicitis is as old as the human race. Ruffer found evidences of it in the Egyptian mummies of a thousand years before Christ.

Ever since man gave up an exclusively vegetarian diet and began to walk upright on his hind feet he has had appendicitis. But he didn't call it that. The doctors of fifty years ago called it "bilious colic," or "inflammation of the bowels." They knew there was something wrong going on in the patient's abdomen, but they didn't dare open him up to find out what the trouble was, because they knew that if they did the patient would die from the operation, while if they let him alone he might get well.

So they gave him opium to deaden the pain and he either got well or died, although in the great majority of cases he died.

About forty years ago Pasteur proved that inflammation and infection are due to minute germs. Sir Joseph Lister, an English surgeon, found out how to keep these germs out of wounds so as to avoid infection. This was the beginning of modern surgery. As soon as the surgeon could open the human body and close it up again without killing the patient, it was found that what had been called "inflammation of the bowels" was often due to an inflammation of the appendix, a little glove-like portion of the intestines, which we inherited from our herbivorous ancestors. It is of no use to civilized man and is rather a danger because it easily becomes inflamed.

When this happens, the patient has pain and tenderness in the right groin, generally with increased temperature. If the inflammation goes on until the wall of the appendix is softened, it may rupture and produce an abscess or a general peritonitis.

The present-day surgeon doesn't wait for perforations. He makes a little incision through the skin and muscles, slips in his finger, draws out the inflamed appendix, ties it off and removes it, then drops the bowel back into the abdomen, closing the incision with a few catgut stitches.

Appendicitis isn't anything new. The recognition and treatment of the condition are new and proper treatment saves thousands of lives every year.

SPRING TONICS

WITH the first signs of spring our grandmothers went out into the woods and gathered herbs, roots and barley. Sassafras or camomile tea, spruce beer or ginger beer? Whatever it was, it was to "cool the blood," which was supposed to become hot and thick during the long winter.

This belief in a "spring tonic," like many popular delusions, had its origin in the teachings of the wise men of the past.

The old physiologists believed that there were four "humors" or fluids in the body—blood, lymph, black bile and yellow bile—and that disease was caused by improper combinations of these four fluids. In the winter the blood was supposed to become thick and hot.

Doctors know better now, but the popular belief still persists.

The sassafras tea our grandmothers used to make wasn't bad stuff. It was brown and sparkling and pungent with the spicy odors of the spring woods. It didn't "thin the blood," but it didn't do us any harm and was the best our good old grandmothers knew.

Yet, like many popular beliefs, there was a germ of truth in it.

During the winter most of us stay in the house too much. We sit at a desk or a worktable too constantly. We wear too heavy clothes. We eat too much heavy food. We don't get enough fresh air and sunshine.

When spring comes we feel the universal impulse toward growth and regeneration. We want new life. We want stimulation. We need a "spring tonic," but we don't need one out of a bottle.

The best spring tonic is God's great outdoors.

So get outdoors and play. It doesn't matter how. It may be with a golf stick or a shotgun or a baseball or a canoe paddle. Hunt up your old fishing tackle and overhaul it.

Now is the time for boys to get out their marbles and to start building kites.

It's the time for little girls to get their skipping ropes and jack stones.

It's the time for baseball on the vacant lots and for pitching horseshoes in the backyard.

We all need a spring tonic. You can get your share.

There's air and sunshine enough for everybody and they don't cost a cent.

Recovery From Influenza Hastened by

PE-RU-NA

Mr. C. A. Allen, R. R. No. 2, Bondurant, Iowa, gives testimony to the healing power of Pe-ru-na. Influenza left him much run down in health with catarrh of the nose, throat and bronichal tubes punctuated with attacks of asthma. He writes:

"While recovering from the Influenza I was so weak I could not gain any strength for two months. The latter part of the winter, I bought six bottles of Pe-ru-na and began taking it. My weight increased to 175 pounds, the most I ever weighed.

My usual winter weight is 155. If you can use this letter for any good, you are perfectly welcome."

Such evidence cannot fail to convince the rankest unbeliever of the merits of Pe-ru-na.

Insist upon having the old and original remedy for catarrhal conditions.

Extravagance

Old Hen Roddy, from Hogskin Hollow, is fond of boasting of his amazing thriftiness by virtue of which he has accumulated a fairly substantial bank account.

"You're very careful about your expenditures, aren't you, Uncle Hen?" the village schoolmaster asked one day.

"Yes, perfesser, I'm right smart that-away. Fact, I don't recollec' that I ever spent but one quarter fer jist dern foolishness. That was when I let a storekeeper talk me into buyin' a pair o' socks."—Everybody's Magazine.

Don't chuckle if you put over a substitute when an advertised product is called for. Maybe your customer will never come back.

Belief in Vampires

No legend like the vampire is more common in central Europe and the Balkans, especially in Transylvania. It has persisted in the folklore of these peoples for ages, and in many Balkan villages there are persons today who are considered vampires and who not infrequently are found mysteriously dead, with their heads cut off and a stake driven through their hearts.

Hydro-Electric Power Service
-and the Farm

EXTENSION of power service to Alabama farms—that those who live in rural districts may enjoy the same conveniences as city dwellers—is the ultimate hope and aim of investigations now being made by the Agricultural Experiment Station of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute at Auburn with the co-operation of Alabama Power Company. Under this co-operative plan, engineers of Alabama Power Company and agents of the Experiment Station at Auburn are conducting research work and investigations with the hope that practical means may be found to supply Alabama farms with central station electric service.

APPROXIMATELY 40 miles of experimental rural lines have been built or are now in process of construction in different sections representative of Alabama's diverse farming interests. Four lines, 12 miles in length, are being used in Madison County near Huntsville and one 5 mile line in Jefferson near Gardendale; another 4 mile line is building now in Chambers County near Five Points and one, 8 miles in length, in Elmore County, near Elmore; an 8 mile line has been authorized in Elmore County near Eclectic and a 2 mile line in Jefferson County near Edgewood.

RESEARCH work is being carried on at the Institute in connection with milk sterilization, incubation, poultry lighting for egg forcing, hay curing, sweet potato curing, dish washing, dehydrating fruits and vegetables, storing farm products and many other practical every day uses.

FARMERS on routes of experimental rural lines are being urged to install these and other labor saving devices which may be operated with electric current, and which will lighten farm work for both the farmer and the housewife on the farm.

WHILE investigations are yet in the experimental stage, Auburn and Alabama Power Company officials are hopeful that the research work now being carried on will develop that electric service can be supplied to many rural communities by developing new and useful applications of electric energy to agricultural needs.

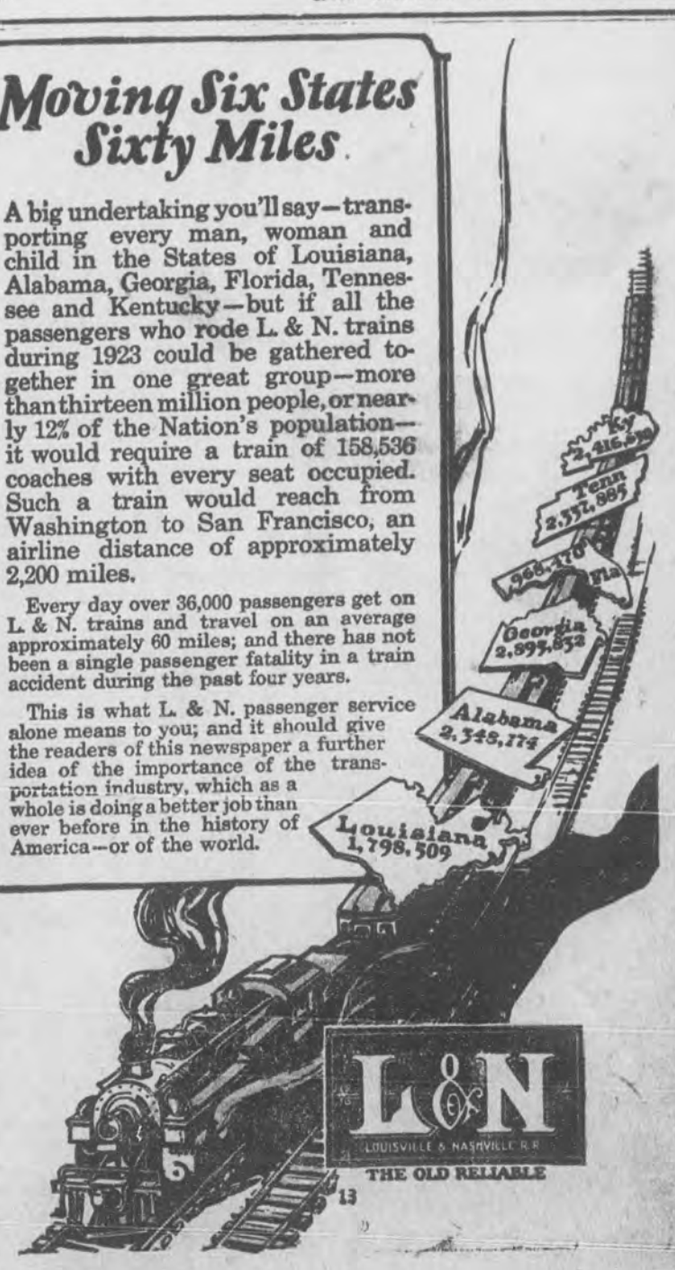
Moving Six States Sixty Miles

A big undertaking you'll say—transporting every man, woman and child in the States of Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Tennessee and Kentucky—but if all the passengers who rode L. & N. trains during 1923 could be gathered together in one great group—more than thirteen million people, or nearly 12% of the Nation's population—it would require a train of 158,536 coaches with every seat occupied. Such a train would reach from Washington to San Francisco, an airline distance of approximately 2,200 miles.

Every day over 36,000 passengers get on L. & N. trains and travel on an average approximately 60 miles; and there has not been a single passenger fatality in a train accident during the past four years.

This is what L. & N. passenger service alone means to you; and it should give the readers of this newspaper a further idea of the importance of the transportation industry, which as a whole is doing a better job than ever before in the history of America—or of the world.



MRS. BUSH TELLS OTHER WOMEN

How Pains in Side and Dragging Down Feelings Were Relieved by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Massena, N. Y.—"I had terrible pains in both my sides and a dragging-down feeling that affected me so that I could hardly walk, and I got run-down. A friend who had taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound advised me to try it and I have taken it with the best results. I do my housework and also some outdoor work on the farm. The Vegetable Compound has given me back my health and I can not praise it enough. I am perfectly willing that you should use these facts if my letter will help other women who still suffer."—Mrs. DELBERT BUSH, R. F. D. 1, Massena, N. Y.

The spirit of helpfulness shown in the letters we are constantly publishing is worthy of notice.

These women know by experience what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will do. Your troubles are the same as theirs. Isn't it reasonable to expect the same results?

If you have pains and a dragging-down feeling and are nervous and irritable, profit by Mrs. Bush's experience and give the Compound a trial.

Brown was interviewing candidates for the job of gardener. The one before him did not seem promising, but Brown thought he would give him a chance.

"Er—how long were you in your last place?" he asked.

Off his guard, the applicant replied, "A month, sir."

"Eh? That's not very long! And the one before that?"

"Three months, sir," replied the applicant, boldly.

"That's better, now. And the time before that?"

The applicant drew himself up proudly as he said: "There wasn't no time before that, sir; I got off with a fine."

The SANDMAN STORY

THE BUTTERCUPS

LITTLE MISS BUTTERCUP looked at her cousin, the Daisy, with envious eyes. She envied her the dainty white frill she wore around her bright face. "And then she is so tall and graceful," sighed Miss Buttercup. "I am so short, I never shall be graceful. Oh, dear, will no one help me to get a white frill?"

"How silly you are," buzzed a bee who was passing. "You are a brighter gold color than your cousin, Daisy. You might not look well wearing a white ruffle."

"Oh, but I should, I know," pouted Miss Buttercup. "I might be prettier

Saw a Field of Golden Cups.

even than Cousin Daisy if I had a frill like hers. Oh dear, will no one help me to get a white frill to go with my bright yellow color?"

"Don't be silly," piped a robin. "If you don't stop fussing you soon will be crying and will spoil your bright looks. There are plenty of white frills in the field now. If you wore one you would spoil the picture of gold you and your sisters make. Be happy and remain as you are."

But no, Miss Buttercup did not wish to wear all yellow. She fussed and fretted until she had all of her sister buttercups discontented as well and pretty soon they all began to cry, saying between their sobs, "Will no one help us to get a pretty white frill? Oh, dear; oh, dear, how unhappy we are!"

Now in those days the gold buttercup was not a cup at all but just a little flat petaled flower, making the fields bright as they do now, but not cup-shaped.

But nothing the bees or the birds could say stopped the buttercups from crying and one night when the fairies and their Queen were flitting through the fields and meadows they heard the sobs of the discontented Buttercups.

So the fairies stopped to ask why they cried so hard and when the Buttercups told them they wanted a white frill like their cousins, the Daisies, the fairies ran to their Queen and asked her to grant the Buttercups' wish.

"Oh, but my dear, can't you see what would happen?" said the Queen. "The fields would be robbed of a flower and Mother Nature knows best what should grow just where she has placed each golden flower."

But the fairies begged their Queen so hard to do something for the Buttercups that she at last said she would curve each petal till it formed a cup and then they would be buttercups indeed.

So the Buttercups stopped crying and the fairies worked all night curling each petal until the morning Mr. Sunman looked down and saw a field of gold cups where the flat gold flowers had been the night before.

Still the Buttercups wer not happy. They had not got the white frill they had cried for. Often at night they cry. But now their tears do not roll from their gold-colored faces. The cup-shaped petals hold them and Mr. Sunman has to dry their tears before they can hold up their heads as they should to make the fields all gold.

"See all the work you have made me," he says as he wipes their faces. "Why are you so silly as to cry for white frills?"

But this makes no difference to the Buttercups and when some morning you see drops of water in some of the Buttercups in the field you may know they are still crying for a frill like the one worn by Cousin Daisy.

This veteran of the stage and the "movies," one of the popular leading men in pictures, was one of the world's leading baritones for many years. Mr. Carleton was born and educated in London, England. He began his public career as an opera singer, later turning his attention to motion pictures.

Have You This Habit?

By Margaret Morison

DRIVING A BARGAIN

PERHAPS there had come to life again in Phoenicia Flint the spirit of some old Roman-British ancestor, a grim trader in pelts and tin. Who knows? At all events, there was the same aquiline profile, the same tight, thin lips, the same love of a bargain.

When she was a young girl of seventeen, her habit of making a good deal was already fully developed. That is the age when femininity enjoys extravagantly exchanging its various frivolous possessions. It was a question of a brooch of Phoenicia's for the party dress of one of her friends. The friend was doubtful; and Phoenicia, with that old inherited trading instinct of hers, did not press her bid. Many ribbons and furbelows had changed owners when finally Phoenicia said as with an after-thought, "I tell you what I'll do; I'll give you this pin of mine for those gloves of yours—if you throw in your old party dress!" And the dress was Miss Flint's.

At the reduction sale at a small shop, one saw the glitter in her eye that meant business. She would hold a French hat off at arm's length critically with the expression of one who knew a good thing—really. Then she would ask for the original price and smile like an expert unbeguiled. Finally, picking up her gloves to depart, she would say casually over her shoulder, "I will give such-and-such for the hat," naming a figure several dollars below the marked price. Usually she got what she was after. And her habit grew apace.

Then Phoenicia fell in love—in love, that is, with as much of her emotion as had not been diverted to business. At all events, she wanted to marry a certain young man. Therefore, there naturally ensued a conflict within her personality. She went to her father; her fiance was poor; they couldn't afford to marry on his present income; her own allowance from the family increased somewhat would meet all needs so long as there were no children, etc., etc. And the bargain was made. That same day, Phoenicia called upon her aunt to announce her engagement. She had decided upon an early wedding.

That evening she divulged to her fiance what a useful partner he was taking into his life. Phoenicia, however, struck no answering spark. Indeed there was coldness, silence, and a somewhat abrupt departure where she had looked for endearments and congratulations. When eventually her engagement was called off, she was for the first time in her life baffled. She had come upon a situation where business methods would not work. Her habit of driving a hard bargain had met its Waterloo.

The Why of Superstitions

By H. IRVING KING

THE LOOKING GLASS

FOR a person to come up and look over your shoulder into a mirror into which you are already gazing brings bad luck is a common enough belief, being one of the many "looking-glass superstitions" which had their birth in the far-off days when man's only mirror was a tranquil pool, were continued down through the ages when mirrors were become pieces of polished metal and arrived at our time with vitality unabated, unimpaired. The foundation was the belief of primitive man that the reflection, like the shadow, of a person was a vital part of his being and "astral body" as it were, or an "external soul" which went out of him when he cast a shadow or when his image was reflected. Such is the belief among all savage peoples today and the looking-glass superstitions of the civilized peoples merely afford one more piece of evidence affirmative of the proposition that savagery and civilization are like "The Colonel's Lady and Julie O'Grady." Now when you look into a mirror and thereby project into it a vital part of your spiritual self, and another person comes up and looks into the mirror over your shoulder, thereby projecting a vital part of his spiritual self into it, those two "souls" are likely to get more or less mixed up—which is bad and likely to cause complications of an unfortunate kind. One of them may be stronger than the other and so annex a part of its vitality, or hinder its return to where it belongs. Or one may be of a malevolent turn and injuriously affect the other. At any rate it is a risky proceeding and likely to "bring bad luck."

"What's in a Name?"

By MILDRED MARSHALL

FACTS about your name; it's history; meaning; whence it was derived; significance; your lucky day and lucky jewel

IRMA

IRMA is one of the many feminine names derived from Teutonic nythology. Its evolution is somewhat nvolved, and it cannot be definitely letermined when or how its final form, which comes to us as Irma, was reached. It is evidently the Anglicization of a patently Teutonic form. Curiously enough, it signifies "public peace."

Tracing Irma back to its mythological origin, it is revealed that the third son of Mannus was said to be Er, a deity worshiped as Irman or Ermin. The evolution of this word through German nomenclature is irrelevant here, but the curious fact remains that its feminine form appears in the Teutonic language as Herminie, not Irminie or Irma, as one might suppose.

In Italy, however, the name Ermeinda arose and named a saintly virgin of the Sixth century. Spain had already received Irmin, and had proceeded to give it various interpretations, until a certain Hermenburga is discovered among the royal princesses. This lady was offered in marriage to a Frank king, but the honor was declined.

Ermesinda was the name of the lady who carried the blue blood of the Balten to the line of Alfonso. Her name meant public dignity. Southey, in his famous poem calls her Hermesind.

The Anglo-Saxon version was Ermatrude and Irmagarde or Ermengarde. The latter form is frequent in Germany today.

The beryl is Irma's talismanic stone. It is said to make its wearer amiable and unconquerable, and to awaken love in married people. Friday is Irma's lucky day and 2 her lucky number.

DEVICE STIRS MILK WHILE IT IS COOLED

Fresh milk is often stirred in order to cool it, and this is usually done by hand, which is a slow and tiresome task. A simple device for doing the work automatically by water flowing into a tank, as shown in the drawing, can be made by any farmer from materials that are available everywhere.

The device consists of a shallow box, made of one-inch pine boards. The ends are sloping and the box is divided into two equal parts by a board extending vertically in the center about eight or ten inches above the sides. The box is mounted at its center on a wooden axle, and a stirring paddle is attached to each end as indicated. These paddles are made from laths, planed smooth, and having a number of short crosspieces nailed on. In use, the milk cans are placed in the water tank and the stirring device arranged as shown in the drawing, the rocking-box being located under a water pipe so that the water first flows into one side and then into the other side alternately. As soon as one side of the box is filled the weight of the water causes the box to tilt over, and the other side of the box is then filled.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Young Calves Made Good Gains on Corn Silage

Silage, when fed to calves less than three or four months old, produced good gains economically, with no bad physical effects, in a test made during the past winter at the Iowa experiment station.

Five Jersey and four Guernsey calves, averaging at the start about fifty days of age, were divided into three groups. Before the trial they received whole milk, skim milk, grain and alfala hay. After being divided into groups, they were continued for eight days on part whole milk and then changed wholly to skim milk. A grain mixture consisting of three parts cornmeal, three parts ground oats, two parts bran and one part oilmeal was hand fed. Timothy hay, salt and water was available at all times.

Each group was fed silage for a 40-day period in addition to the regular ration and then sliced roots replaced the silage for a 40-day period. Still a third 40-day period was used in which the calves received only the timothy hay and grain ration. Slightly more than four pounds of corn silage a day was consumed by each calf during the silage feeding period. The consumption of sliced beets ran 5.74 pounds per calf per day.

It was found that the silage or roots reduced the amount of hay eaten and that growth was more rapid. Less other feed was required with the silage or roots, and the gains were cheaper. No scouring due to silage feeding occurred.

Through the Needle's Eye

It is a fact that there is in the wall of Jerusalem a small gateway built for the use of pedestrians and known by a name which is translated as "The Needle's Eye." Through this gate it is quite possible for a small undernourished camel, divested of all its equipment, harness, etc., by kneeling, to work its way, though not without difficulty. The gate is still in existence.

Ale Once Labeled Poison

Years ago in the merry days of the English tavern there was a turmoil among radicals over the "poisoning" of the ale drunk by the common people. The trouble was caused when some one learned that in making ale sulphuric acid, made from Spanish pyrites, was used and that this contained arsenic. It was a tempest in a teapot, however, because it would have taken five barrels of ale to contain enough arsenic to hurt one individual.

MINERAL FEED FOR HOGS MEETS FAVOR

Mineral feed for hogs getting the ordinary corn-belt swine rations has shown its dollars and cents value in experimental work done at the Iowa state college. Even where growing pigs had access to good pasture such as rape or bluegrass the benefits of minerals have been outstanding. The addition of 20 per cent of tankage to the ration of pigs on rape pasture was not sufficient to supply the necessary mineral matter. In case the protein supplement should be soy-bean or linseed oilmeal in place of tankage, the mineral deficiency would be still greater.

John Evvard, the man in charge of the investigation, recommends that a suitable mineral mixture be fed all classes and grades of swine. If possible, feed it in a self-feeder preferably inside and easily accessible. Such a mixture may be composed of the following: Common salt, 20 pounds; finely ground raw bonemeal or steamed bonemeal, 40 pounds, and finely ground high calcium limestone, wood ashes, finely ground oyster shells, clam shells or lime thoroughly air slaked, 40 pounds. To each 100 pounds of mixture add 10 pounds of sulphur, if it is desired, and from one-half to one ounce of potassium iodide. Mix thoroughly.

Besides the immediate value realized from feeding minerals to hogs there has been found to be a cumulative value in the case of breeding stock. At the Iowa experiment station the first generation of sows fed minerals showed but slight advantage over gilts fed no minerals. The second generation showed some positive signs of benefit, chiefly in an increased height and length. In the third generation the advantages were plainly evident in added gains in weight. It appears that there is a tendency for the benefits of minerals to show up to greater degree as the generations unfold.

For breeding swine the following minerals mixed together are recommended: Common salt, spent bone-black, wood ashes, sulphur, high calcium limestone, glauber's salt, epsom salt, copperas and potassium iodide.

Vermin Discourage Hogs From Returning Profit

Vermin such as worms, lice, and the like, may keep the hogs from growing and cost the farmer in dollars and cents much more than the time and expense of fighting them, according to the New York State College of Agriculture at Ithaca.

In fact, the college goes further and says that most farms where hogs have been kept for any length of time on the same premises are infested with parasites which will give trouble if they are not controlled.

There are several kinds of worms that infest hogs, and each kind requires a different treatment. If hogs are suspected of being infested with worms, the owners should get in touch with a veterinarian, the college states.

One farmer of which the college learned had about 70 head of pigs averaging between 50 and 75 pounds. These pigs became stunted and made very little gains, and some of them died. Upon inspection they were found badly infested with round worms and with lice. They were then successfully treated as advised by a veterinarian.

These pigs were also treated for lice, a prepared dip in a large barrel being used. The pigs were small enough to be easily handled and were immersed in the barrel of dip. This treatment was repeated in a week's time to get the lice or nits that were left from the previous dipping.

They were then transferred to a fresh pasture where they were finished for the early fall market.

Live Stock Notes

Put spring lambs on the local markets.

Feed the spring lambs grain in a creep until they are marketed.

Avoid dust; it is almost as bad as mud wallows.

If spring pigs have not been inoculated for cholera, do it now.

Select animals for show and give special attention until show time.

Rape is an excellent supplementary pasture crop for the flock, especially when pastures are short in August and September. One acre is sufficient to "flush" 75 head of ewes for breeding.

* * *

When cholera starts in a herd it usually shows first on one or two hogs.

"Meat for Health" has been adopted as the official slogan of the live stock and meat industry of the United States.

* * *

"Many farmers saved by pigs, hens, cows, corn and legumes," is a line the one-crop farmer might read over carefully. The above is the heading of a recent circular sent out by the Department of Agriculture.

If You Need a Medicine You Should Have the Best--Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root

Have you ever stopped to reason why it is that so many products that are extensively advertised all at once drop out of sight and are soon forgotten? The reason is plain—the article did not fulfill the promises of the manufacturer. This applies more particularly to a medicine. A medicinal preparation that has real curative value almost sells itself, as like an endless chain system the remedy is recommended by those who have been benefited to those who are in need of it.

A prominent druggist says, "Take for example Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, a preparation I have sold for many years and never hesitate to recommend, for in almost every case it shows excellent results, as many of my customers testify. No other kidney remedy has so large a sale."

According to sworn statements and verified testimony of thousands who have used the preparation, the success of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is due to the fact, so many people claim, that it fulfills almost every wish in overcoming kidney, liver and bladder ailments, corrects urinary troubles and neutralizes the uric acid which causes rheumatism.

You may receive a sample bottle of Swamp-Root by parcel post. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., and enclose ten cents; also mention this paper. Large and medium size bottles for sale at all drug stores.—Advertisement.

Entrenched Prejudice

Most nations, like most men, are docile only in youth; they become incorrigible as they grow old. When customs are once established and prejudices rooted, it is a dangerous and useless enterprise to try to reform them, the people will not permit their misfortunes to be touched upon, even for their instruction—like the stupid and cowardly sick who shudder at sight of a physician.—Jean Jacques Rousseau.

Easiest and cheapest thing to dispense is praise; and the dividends are always good.

Seems Like Good Idea

A western inventor has patented a system of building construction carried out on the principle of a thermos bottle. A building of any kind, bungalow, large house or commercial structure, has double walls with a vacuum between. The inventor claims that 50 per cent of the usual heating costs can be saved by his idea. The air space keeps the interior of the building warm in winter, cool in summer, damp proof and sound proof. Also, cheaper construction cost and upkeep are claimed.

ENUINE INTEREST IN MEMORIAL SERVICE

Few services held in Columbiana a long time aroused such gen- e interest as the memorial rvice held at the cemetery Sun- y afternoon. There was a good tendance, a number of people m other communities having me in to attend the service.

An informal program consist- of appropriate songs, the ading in concert of the twenty rd Psalm, prayer and talks was rried out. Of unusual interest to ery one was the talk given by G. Parker, one of the oldest idents of Columbiana, who call- by name a long list of those o have been laid to rest there thin the forty-six years since came to Columbiana to live. mong them were names of some the most useful citizens Shelby unty has ever had. Mr. Parker ferred feelingly to the fact that ty unknown confederate soldiers presenting possibly every south- n state, lie buried is the Colum- ana cemetery, they having died Shelby Springs during the ar and having been brought here interment.

In the closing talk, Rev. T. K. berts, who started the movement r an organization that would wide better care for the cem- ery, thanked all those who had any way taken part in the rk done, and urged that every e should continue his efforts un- a permanent organization has en perfected.

After the service the people, ny of whom had brought flow- s for the graves of their loved es, walked over the grounds ading again the epitaphs that l of those who lie asleep, and erving with a sense of comfort e work of improvment that has en done within the past two eks. They then dispersed to ir homes, having felt in their n lives doubtless a re-kindling the hope of a blessed immortal- , because of this hour spent in e presence of those who have sed through the Valley of the adow and into their final rest.

Squirrel Season Opens November First

Dear Editor:

I desire to call the attention of the shooting public to the fact that the squirrel season does not open this year until November 1. The season was changed by Act of the Legislature, which Act was approved by the Governor last year after the 1923-24 hunting license had been printed.

The Legislature not only moved the date of the opening of the season, but greatly increased the penalty for violating the provisions of the game laws.

Very truly yours,
I. T. QUINN,
Commissioner of Game and Fisheries.

FARM INCLUDED IN GIFT TO COLLEGE

Montevallo, Alabama, Aug. 25.— Among the many gifts to the Montevallo Drive perhaps the most unique and one of the most appreciated is the gift of a farm of seventy-three acres and farm house by H. Herzfield, of Alexander City This farm is about ten miles from the city and will probably be sold and the money be credited to the Drive. Mr. Herzfield has taken a deep interest in every education drive and is especially concerned for the success of Montevallo.

Ready For Opening

Many improvements are being made at the college preparatory to the opening on Spetember 20th. The carpenters, cleaners and painters begin work this week renovating the dormitory so as to have everything spick and span. There is one thing that is done here that is not done done at any other college and that is every mattress is run through a high steaming process in the laundry dryer, making it impossible for any living creature, if perchance there should be one to continue in any college bed. By this plan every student is assured that there are no vermin here

Dairy Barn Enlarged

The dairy barn has been completely renovated, repainted and enlarged. Several new registered Jersey and Holstein cows will be ready for use at the opening of the new session. Milk will be produced under the most possible sanitary conditions. A new pump has just been installed in the College spring and is supplying a much greater supply of water which is needed by the increased number of students as well as by the growing population of Montevallo.

Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Norris and their son Franklin returned last Thursday from a delightful motor trip during which they visited Dadeville and a number of places in Georgia. It was Mr. Norris' first vacation in several years.

MONTEVALLO AND COLUMBIANA JOIN TO CELEBRATE EXCHANGE NIGHT

Revival in Columbiana This Week

The revival services announced for Columbiana for this week were begun at the Methodist church Sunday with two strong sermons by the pastor, Rev. W. A. Mays. On Monday night a large congregation heard Rev. R. W. Stuckey, pastor of the Baptist church. Tuesday night the evangelist, Rev. J. O. Hanes, accompanied by his singer, Mr. Stalnaker, reached Columbiana and Mr. Hanes assumed charge of the services Tuesday night. Some delay was experienced in getting the tent, it having been shipped to Columbia, Ala., by mistake. It was expected that the tent would be received Wednesday and placed on the public school ground where the services would be continued as planned.

Coach Lyman Plans For Winning Team

Friends of Paul Lyman of Montevallo will read with interest the article below, taken from a recent issue of the Talladega Daily Home

"W. P. Lyman, coach of Darlington School, Rome, Ga., and 20 members of the 1924 football team arrived in Talladega Monday. The team will camp for about two weeks at Lock 12 as guests of Alabama Power Company.

"While in camp the boys will take up football practice with much signal work, boxing, rowing, track work and various other forms of athletics and will try to turn out a winning team for the school.

"Lyman is a former Georgia Tech football star and he predicts a first team for Darlington."

High School to Open Under New Plan

As was announced in last week's issue of the Reporter, Shelby County High School will open September 8th. Under the new plan of reorganization on the 6-3-3 basis, the high school will take the Junior 3rd, year, and three years of the regular Senior High School. Last year's 7th grade becomes 8th grade, or last year of Junior High School; last year's 10th grade becomes 12th grade in Senior High School, or the graduating class for the incoming scholastic year.

Students who come from uncredited schools will be required to stand an entrance examination before being classified.

The regular fee of $5.00 per pupil will be charged for each of the two semesters, $2.50 of which is a matriculation fee, and $2.50 is a laboratory fee. These fees are due on the first day of school and should be paid or vouched for before the student is eligible to enrollment in classes.

Parents and friends of the school are cordially invited to attend the opening on the first morning of school. The teachers are anxious to meet and know you. See next week's Reporter for further detail.

J. M. Tucker,

The new garage recently bought by Brown Brothers from C. R. Tinney has been leased by Dean Brothers of Montevallo and is being operated by them.

Dargin community was well represented at the Baptist association meeting Tuesday at Vincent. Among those who passed through Columbiana on their way were: Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Frost, Mr. and Mrs. J. N. Wyatt, Mr. and Mrs. J. F Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. T. C. Littleton, Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Stonecypher, with several members of their respective families.

Formal Recognition Is Given To The Local Club

Charter night for the Exchange Club of Columbiana brought full recognition of the club from national headquarters and full affiliation with the national organization in every way. They town of Columbiana, because of the existence of the club may now take its place among hundreds of other progressive towns and cities throughout the country, whose citizenship has heard the call to community service and has undertaken through the medium of such an organization to answer this call.

The charter meeting was held at the High School auditorium, and the members of the club had for the occasion as their guests their wives and friends together with a large number of the members of the Exchange Club of Montevallo with their wives and friends. Perhaps never before in the history of the two towns had so many of their people been brought together for so delightful an occasion. An elaborate banquet prepared by the ladies of Columbiana, Exchangettes they call them, was served by a group of beautiful young ladies who kindly volunteered their services.

A delightful feature of the evening's exercises was the brilliant musical program prepared by Mrs. Mildred White Wallace, and given by herself, Mrs. Jane Middleton, violin, Miss Edith Averyt, piano, and Ehney Camp, baritone.

Words of welcome to the visitors were spoken by Judge L. B. Riddle and appropriate response was made by C. G. Smith, president of the Montevallo Club. Formal presentation of the charter in behalf of the National Exchange Club was made by O. C. Carmichael, secretary of the Montevallo club, who told briefly of the meaning and purpose of Exchange. In accepting the charter in behalf of the local club, F. G. Koenig, president, made an earnest pledge on the part of himself and his associates to endeavor to live up to the high standard of service set by the Exchange Clubs of the country.

J. Fred Johnson, Jr., of Montgomery club, in a pleasing address presented to the Montevallo club a beautiful pennant in recognition of their work in assisting to organize the Columbiana club and presented to Messrs. Smith and Carmichael handsome service pins for their individual efforts in that work.

In accepting these emblems, these gentlemen in behalf of their club and of themselves, made appropriate response.

Farmers Meeting at Fourmile Friday Night

A meeting for the farmers of the Fourmile community who are interested in dairying will be held at the school house Friday night, August 29th. This will be the opening meeting of the night school for farmers to be conducted by J. P. Montgomery, teacher of vocational agriculture in Shelby County High School. Mr. Montgomery will demonstrate the use of cream separators at the meeting.

Dr. Petty of Albany, has suggested a plan for preventing so many accidents at railroad crossings. It is that a series of ridges be made across the road leading to a crossing so that cars would have to slow up.

Farmers of Coffee county are making plans for their first crop of vetch to be planted this fall.

FINAL GORGAS UNIT PUT IN OPERATION

30,000 HORSEPOWER, SUFFICIENT TO LIGHT CITY OF 50,000 POPULATION ADDED TO EQUIPMENT.

Birmingham—The final unit of the Gorgas steam plant of the Alabama Power company has been completed and placed in operation. The plant, built in three units, will furnish a very large additional electric energy to this state, it being stated that the additional power is sufficient to light the homes of a city of 50,000 population. The unit guarantees 30,000 horsepower, making the total production at Gorgas over 100,000 horsepower. An announcement from the executive offices of the Alabama Power company says that the plant is the largest steam producer in the South.

The completion of this unit, making the final step in the development at Gorgas, is one of special interest, in view of the prominence given the plant in the Henry Ford bid for Muscle Shoals, and subsequently the statement from H. Ellis McCormack, vice president of the Pratt Consolidated Coal company, that he owned the land on which Gorgas was built.

The Alabama Power company built one unit at Gorgas and was at work on the second when plans were changed to accommodate the government during the war. The government completed the second unit and in September, 1923, the Alabama Power company paid the government $3,472,487.25 for the unit. The third unit was started in October, 1923, and was completed in record time.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

The graphite plants, constructed in Clay county during the war, have been sold to Canadian interests and the equipment shipped to that country. Dan Martin, of the McClary-Jemison Machinery company, said that he had purchased about seventeen of the plants and sold them to various companies in the Birmingham district for purpose other than making graphite, and two to Canadian interests. The statement was also made that the dissembling of the plants was expected to continue until all of the forty-one plants built for graphite manufacturers were removed.

Many accidents have happened on the approach to the Cahaba bridge on the Marion Junction road, near Selma, but none equalled in sheer pluck a Louisiana woman driving several tourists to Selma. Her car collided with a truck driven by G. R. Rentz, of Marion Junction and plunged down a twenty foot embankment, but by a marvelous balance landed on all four wheels and was driven back to the road. The lady asked "Is any one hurt?" The Louisiana car then drove on to Selma and bought a new wheel for the Rentz truck.

The state securities commission has effected a reorganization of its affairs under the new codified securities law of the state, which went into effect August 17. At a meeting of the commission Captain W. C. Oates, who has held the title of executive officer of the securities commission, was re-elected, with the new title of secretary-examiner of the commission. Mrs. R. C. Henry, formerly stenographer of the Alabama Public Service Commission, was employed as stenographer of the securities commission.

A new cotton disease has appeared in Alabama. It is known as "cotton blight" and is caused by a fungus, ascochyta gossypli. Information as to its appearance reached Auburn in the form of a specimen from a Houston county farmer who said that it had spread over an area of a quarter of an acre in his field. Examination of this specimen by Dr. L. E. Miles, plant pathologist for the extension service, revealed that it was cotton blight, and a recent examination of the property confirmed this diagnosis.

A big demonstration has been planned for the celebration of Labor Day by the various labor organizations of Florence, Sheffield and Tuscumbia, who will celebrate jointly. A monster parade, several miles in length, composed of floats representing the business interests of the three cities will move from Florence to Sheffield, thence to Spring Park in Tuscumbia, where the festivities will be held.

The Lincoln mills corporation, of Huntsville, has a large force of mechanics at work in the new mill installing machinery and it is expected that the new plant will be ready for operation by the first of October. When the new mill is in operation the pay roll of the Lincoln company will contain approximately 1,500 names, it is estimated.

According to the census recently taken in Tuscumbia, the population has increased by over 500 during the first six months of 1924. Over 75 houses have been built during that time.

The large plant of the Tuscaloosa Lumber company, in East End, Tuscaloosa, was destroyed by fire, entailing a loss of between $75,000 and $100,000.

Sam Aaron, a well known farmer of the Sipsey neighborhood, died after suffering two days from hydrophobia.

The following officers of the Alabama division of the Farmers' Union have been elected for 1924-25: G. T. McElderry, Talladega, president; second term; J. C. Hicks, Centerville, vice president; second term; Mrs. E. A. Painter, Birmingham, secretary-treasurer, third term; W. O. Washburn, Falkville, doorkeeper, and W. S. Cox, chaplain. The executive committee is composed of M. A. Peek, Mrs. W. B. Edmundson, third term; L. O. Cox, R. C. Hicks, second term, and Duvan Dobbins This committee will meet September 18 at the office of the Advance, Birmingham newspaper, devoted to farm interests, at which time they will outline the work of the union in Alabama during the coming year. The committee will hold monthly meetings throughout the year as usual.

Many communities in Morgan county are looking forward to the harvesting of a number of crops planted in an effort to ascertain the value of certain kinds of fertilizer for certain soils and certain crops in Morgan county. In association with the county farm bureau, importers of nitrate of soda and the state agriculture department, County Farm Agent J. C. Ford early this spring had demonstration plots planted at Trinity, Rockyford, Danville, Massey, Eva, Rhine, Somerville, New Centre, Hartselle and the Twin Cities. Mr. Ford said the different fertilizers used were showing remarkable results. Each member of the different communities where the experiments have been tried are to share alike in the financial return.

Leon Tremmer, 11-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. L. M. Tremmer, of Atmore, was badly shaken up when he fell 24 feet from a second story window, while walking in his sleep. Leon's explanation of the accident is that he dreamed the family was eating watermelon and that his mother told him to get some salt. He unlatched the window screen and walked out, escaping serious injury by landing upright, 24 feet below.

Butler county and central Alabama will not produce as much cotton as has been predicted by optimistic forecasters, according to R. A. Beeland, one of Greenville's leading farmer-bankers. Butler county produced approximately 9,000 bales of cotton last year and according to Mr. Beeland she will produce this year approximately 13,000 bales, or about 5,000 bales less than previous estimate.

Auburn alumni are responding readily to a call sent out by Judge H. W. Samford, president of the Auburn Alumni association, looking to the building up of an alumni fund to be used in aiding worthy young men in getting an education at Auburn. The program of the executive committee of the association contemplates the raising of such a fund, and Auburn alumni have been called on to contribute.

A big increase from the sale of licenses for motor vehicles for the first three-quarters of the present fiscal year, from October 1, 1923 to July 1, 1924 is shown by figures furnished by F. C. Marquis, member of the state tax commission. The state received during the nine months a sum of $1,554,979.65 from the sale of motor vehicle licenses.

Coal production in the Alabama field will show an increase of 25,000 tons over the first week in August, according to information given by officials of the Alabama Mining institute. It was stated that the production figures indicated a substantial revival of the coal mining situation, which is expected to be followed now by a gradual climb upward.

Birmingham, according to a bulletin just issued by the United States Census Bureau, had 329 industrial establishments in 1920 with a total invested capital of $115,459,258. This statement does not include many of the large plants just outside the city and which would run the total invested capital up to a considerably larger sum.

The Alabama public service commission in an order granted the petition of the Mobile and Ohio railroad for authority to discontinue Lambert as a flag stop for trains Nos. 1 and 2. A similar request as to the station of Eight Mile was granted in part and denied in part, the railroad being allowed to discontinue train No. 1 at Eight Mile, but not to discontinue train No. 2.

Reduced rates on logs, carloads, from local station Alabama on the lines of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad to Montgomery, will result from authority granted in formal order issued by the Alabama Public Service Commission. The order is based on a petition of the Atlantic Coast Line railroad for authority to revise rates on this commodity between the points named and request for a ruling on the correct present rates.

Four hundred persons attended the annual picnic of the Etowah county farm bureau at Noccalula Falls. The speakers were L. N. Duncan, director of extension service at Auburn; E. E. Binford, field agent for the service, and J. E. Kernachan, president of the Alabama Farm Bureau.

The Davis-Alcott hosiery mill at Gadsden has gone on full time after being operated four days a week for several months. The Attalla hosiery mill has resumed operations after being idle since the first of June.

The new $65,000 Baptist church at Fayette is nearing completion. The pews are expected to arrive soon. The house will be dedicated as soon as completed.

No matter what your experiences may have been, the various fragments of your life may be joined to make success, just as the smallest bits of glass are used in the most beautiful mosaic.

MORE GOOD THINGS

There is such a wealth of good things for the table at this season that it is not hard to find a variety.

Tomato Stuffed With Corn.—Cut out a piece around the stem-end of the required number of tomatoes and scoop out the centers; cut off the tops of corn on the ear, or score the kernels and scrape out the pulp, leaving the hulls on the ears. Sprinkle a little salt on the inside of the tomatoes, add a bit of butter to the corn. Set the pieces cut from the tomatoes in place and put the tomatoes into a buttered baking dish. Bake in a moderate oven until the tomato is cooked.

Wafer Corn Bread.—Mix thoroughly two cupfuls of finely ground corn meal with one-half teaspoonful of salt, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Beat one egg, add two cupfuls of milk, stir into this two tablespoonfuls of molasses which has been heated and then dissolve one tablespoonful of butter. Add the corn meal to the liquid mixture and heat for five minutes—this is the important part of the process. Have ready two shallow pans, greased and floured and pour on the batter in as thin a layer as possible—less than one-fourth inch in thickness. Bake in a hot oven until brown, cut quickly and serve smoking hot.

Vegetable Salad.—To one-fourth of a cupful of French dressing add one teaspoonful each of finely chopped onion and parsley, mix and pour over one-fourth cupful each of shredded cabbage, carrot, sliced celery and radishes and one-half cupful of chopped, cooked beets. Toss and mix well with two forks then serve on lettuce.

South American Chocolate.—Melt one-half pound of sweet chocolate over hot water, add one cupful of very strong coffee slowly and boil one minute. Add six cupfuls of scalded milk and beat until a thick froth forms on top and leave over hot water ten minutes. Chill and carry in a vacuum bottle with a few pieces of ice.

All hail to good health! You never can buy it,
Tho' many by using a vegetable diet
Have lived a long life, with nerves steady and quiet;
Then listen to wisdom, ye people, and try it.

WARM WEATHER FOODS

A dessert which will be enjoyed during the warm days is:

Molded Fig Custard. — Soak one-half package of gelatin and dissolve it in one cupful of boiling milk. Soak one pound of figs (the pulled figs) in water to cover until quite soft. Split each in half, dip into dissolved gelatin and use to line the sides of circular molds. Make a soft custard of a pint of milk, five egg yolks and one-half cupful of sugar. When well-thickened add the rest of the gelatin and with this fill the fig-lined molds. When cold, unmold by dipping into hot water. Pile on top of each some gooseberry jelly and eat with plain, thick cream.

Chocolate Junket.—Melt a square of chocolate; add three tablespoonfuls of boiling water. Heat a quart of milk just lukewarm. Dissolve one junket tablet in a tablespoonful of cold water. Add one-quarter of a cupful of sugar to the milk, with a tablespoonful of vanilla; stir until well mixed; add the junket and the chocolate and pour into sherbet cups.

Emergency Bread Pudding.—Cut six or more slices of bread and remove crusts, spread with butter and jam, arrange in a serving dish and pour over a pint of hot grape juice. Surround with a soft custard or with whipped cream and chopped nuts. Serve hot or cold.

Coffee Ambrosia.—Make one quart of strong coffee; allow this to cool after straining, then add one-half cupful of honey, a few drops of almond extract, a pinch of powdered mace, two cupfuls of iced milk; mix well. Serve in glasses with a few spoonfuls of ice and a spoonful of whipped cream.

Lettuce and Peanut Salad.—Prepare fresh, crisp lettuce and sprinkle with coarsely-chopped fresh peanuts. Serve with a good French dressing poured over all, well chilled.

Lemon Sirup.—This is nice to use and is always ready. Take one cupful of water, one-third of a cupful of lemon juice and one-half cupful of sugar; boil for a few minutes and bottle. Use a spoonful of the sirup to a glass of water with ice.

A few stewed plump prunes served on nice head lettuce with a good snappy dressing makes a most tasty salad and a simple one to prepare.

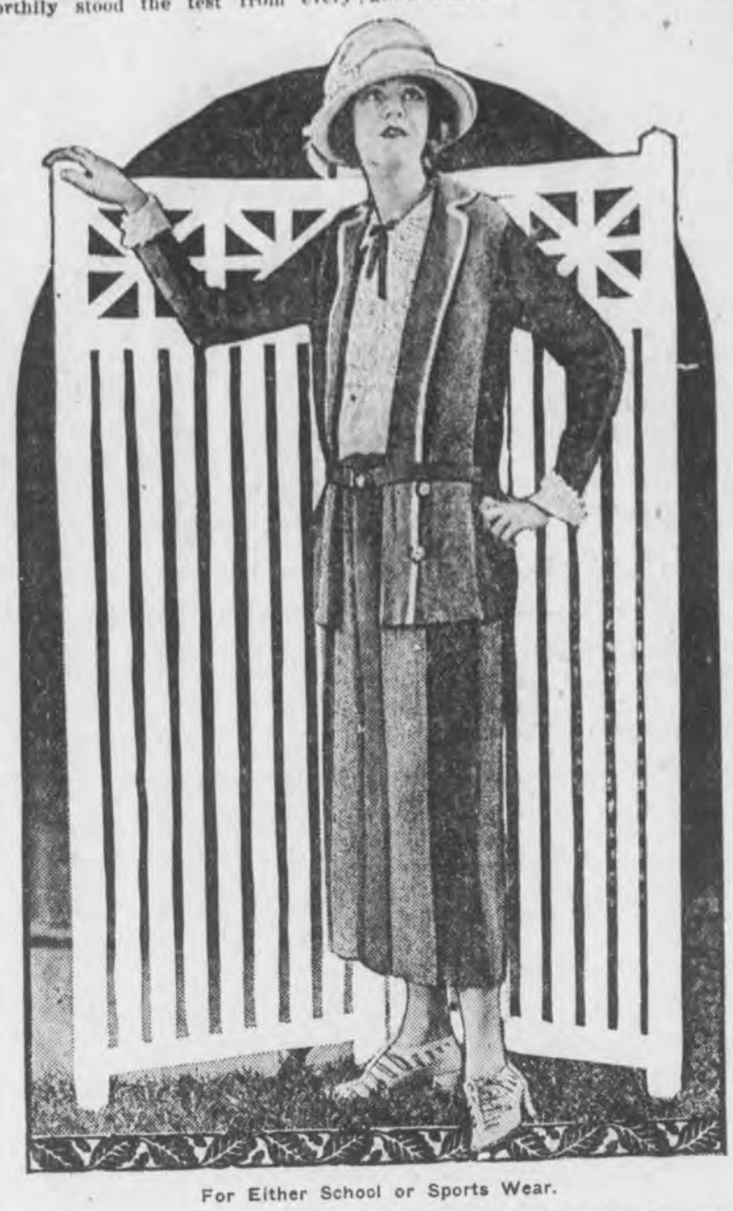
KNITTED SUIT ALWAYS IN FAVOR; USE OF DETACHABLE LACE PANEL

ALMOST have sportswear and knitted outerwear become synonymous terms so closely identified are they in the minds of fashionists and their clientele. When in doubt choose a knitted suit, is apparently the feminine modernists' way of settling the question of smart sportswear. Not so much is this whim or fancy, but rather a direct outgrowth of experience wherein knitted apparel has so worthily stood the test from every angle of practicability, wearability, style and handsome appearance.



For Either School or Sports Wear.

To decide upon a knitted suit for sports and general wear, such as the picture shows, is to exercise the better part of wisdom in the choosing. There's a secret about this particular type of knitted suit, which one would never guess at a glance. It has a dual personality! At least this is true of the jacquette. At one moment a tuxedo, presto! with the deft maneuvering of a button or two, it becomes, in the twinkling of an eye, a clever double-breasted style. Of course this adds to its usefulness as well as affording a pleasing change in appearance. Broad stripes of yellow and green are the handsome autumn-like colors exploited.

The ensemble costume, which is being so widely exploited and elaborated this season, is expressed in all its fascinating moods throughout the new fall knitted models. Among the handsome knitted novelties are long tunics introducing lavish design in some instances, three-quarter-length coats as appealing as any cloth topcoat, carrying correct tailored detail of new sleeve, collar, cuffs and revers, also hip-length coats of brushed wool which compete with the most elegant fur jacquettes. There are plain surfaced heather mixtures, plaided and blocked effects, tapestry allover designs and other fanciful patternings, which being knitted cause one to marvel.

Transform your plainest frocks into a costume de luxe while you wait! That is the miracle the new detachable lace panel with collar performs. It is a transformation as instantaneous as that of Cinderella herself. Touch with the magic of a panel of lace, with collar and perhaps cuffs to match, and one's most ordinary gown assumes the airs of a "dress up" affair. The illustration conveys the idea. One can readily appreciate the alluring possibilities in this new vogue for detachable lace trimming.

The lace and lingerie panels here shown are accessory to the costumes, and can be adjusted without sewing, unless one prefers to take a stitch here and there. The lace panel to the right is the most popular, perhaps; at least more of them are shown in the shops. It is probably forty-five inches long, for that is the usual length. Blouse panels, similar in style are also shown, twenty-two inches long. If the center be not of venise lace then it is almost certain to be of embroidered net as these are the preferred kind. There are little flutings of narrow lace, and the collar combines the two.

Of exquisitely fine batiste is the tucked and lace-inserted panel to the left. The deep flounce is very effective, the entire bespeaking the extreme of refined and exclusive workmanship and design. It is of interest to know that some of the more elaborate sets are accompanied with handsome matching cuffs, many of them being very wide.

If one be so inclined, with a bit of lace, embroidery and net, leisure time, nimble fingers and the ability to create, there is no limit to the lovely ideas along this line which can be worked out at home.

HOW TO KEEP WELL

Dr. Frederick R. Green, Editor of "Health."

(©, 1924, Western Newspaper Union.)

WHAT EVERY WOMAN WANTS

EVERY woman wants a good complexion.

Everyone can not be beautiful because beauty is made up of many factors.

If your nose is Irish instead of Grecian, you can't change it. If your mouth is too large, it can't be helped.

But you can make the best of the face that God gave you. If you have beautiful features, so much the better. If you haven't, you can at least have a beautiful skin.

There is no other one item that is so important for attractiveness as good looks as a good complexion. Neither is there anything to which the average woman devotes so much time and money.

Witness the business done by beauty parlors and the widespread advertising of facial creams, bleaches and powders.

But a good complexion is health. You can't buy it in a box. The skin is the largest organ in the body. It will be good or bad, attractive or repulsive, just in proportion as the body is clean and healthy.

Much can be done by intelligent care and effort to improve your complexion and to make it as attractive as possible.

The most important factor in curing or preserving a good complexion is good digestion. The woman who eats the wrong kind of food, or is unable to digest her food, or whose body is saturated with poison absorbed from the intestinal tract will have a thick, muddy, oily and unattractive skin, no matter how much she may spend on external beautifiers.

No one can have a clear, fresh skin without a plentiful supply of rich, clean blood and this can only be secured by good digestion and elimination.

Proper diet is the first essential.

The woman who eats highly seasoned, rich foods, heavy desserts, large quantities of candy can not have good digestion.

A simple diet of moderate quantities of meat, plenty of well-cooked vegetables and cereals, an abundance of fresh fruits, and above all, plenty of pure water, is necessary for a good digestion and thorough elimination.

This means self control and self denial, but the result is worth the price, not only in a beautiful complexion, but also in better health and well-being.

TYPHOID FEVER

TYPHOID fever has been for centuries one of the most dangerous diseases which afflict man. It was often confused with typhus fever and malaria. People still talk occasionally about "typho-malarial fever." As the farmer said about the giraffe, "They ain't no such animal." The two diseases are entirely distinct.

Typhoid fever is caused by a specific germ or plant, the typhoid bacillus.

Every typhoid germ comes from the discharges from the kidneys or bowels of someone who has had typhoid. The germs can originate in no other way. So typhoid fever is very appropriately called a "filth" disease.

How do the germs enter the body? In dirty milk or dirty water or through food contaminated by flies or by dirty hands.

The germs always get into the body through the mouth. After being swallowed, they pass through the stomach into the small intestine where they grow just as plants grow in a hothouse.

The germs in growing produce a poison or toxin, which causes fever, delirium and, in severe cases, death.

Man is the only animal susceptible to this disease.

We know all about typhoid fever. It is entirely preventable.

Every case of typhoid fever is due to someone's ignorance or carelessness. One health authority has said, "For every case of typhoid someone should be hanged."

How can we prevent it?

By using only pure water. Typhoid no water from surface wells subject to seepage or drainage from outhouses or cesspools is possible.

Practically all our large cities now supply pure water so typhoid fever today, is largely a rural disease.

If you are not sure your water is pure, boil it for twenty minutes and then cool it.

By using pure milk. Protect milk from dirty water. Sterilize cans or buckets by steaming or boiling.

If in doubt, pasteurize the milk by heating it for twenty minutes at 160 degrees F.

By protecting food of all kinds from flies, which carry the typhoid germs on their feet. This was proved in the Camp Chickamauga during the Spanish-American war.

By protecting food from contamination by dirty hands. Wash your hands before eating. See that all those who handle your food have clean hands.

If everything which goes into the mouth is clean, you will never have typhoid fever.

DRAZK'S GREAT IDEA

SYNOPSIS. — Transley's hay-cutting outfit, after stacking 2,000 tons, is on its way to the big Y.D. ranch headquarters. Transley is a master of men and circumstances. Linder, foreman, is substantial, but not self-assertive. George Drazk, one of the men, is an irresponsible chap who proposes to every woman he meets. Transley and Linder dine with Y.D. and his wife and daughter Zen. Transley resolves to marry Zen. Y.D. instructs Transley to cut the South Y.D., "spite o' h—l an' high water" and a fellow named Landson. Drazk proposes to Zen and is neatly rebuffed. Transley pitches camp on the South Y.D. and finds Landson's outfit cutting hay. Denison Grant, Landson's manager, notifies Transley that he is working under a lease from the legal owners and warns Transley off. All of which means war. Y.D. and Zen ride to the South Y.D. Zen is a natural vamp, not yet halter-broke and ripe for mating. Y.D. has taken a liking to Transley. Zen holds Transley off and encourages Linder. Zen enjoys the prospect of a race between Transley and Linder for her favor, but secretly laughs at both. She has another and more serious encounter with Drazk. Y.D. mowing machines are ruined by iron stakes set in the grass.

"So that's the way of it," he said. "That's the kind of war Mr. Landson makes. Well, we can fight back with the same weapons, but that won't cut the hay, will it?"

By this time Y.D. and Transley, with four other teamsters, were observed coming in. Each driver had had the same experience. An iron stake, carefully hidden in a clump of grass, had been driven down into the ground until it was just high enough to intercept the cutting-bar. The fine, sharp knives were crumpled against it; in some cases the heavy cutting-bar, in which the knives operate, was damaged.

Y.D.'s face was black with fury.

"That's the lowest, mangyest, cowardliest trick I ever had pulled on me," he was saying. "I'm plumb equal to ridin' down to Landson's an' drivin' one of them stakes through under his short ribs."

"But can you prove that Landson did it?" said Zen, who had an element of caution in her when her father was concerned. She had a vision of a fight, with Landson pleading entire ignorance of the whole cause of offense, and her father probably summoned by the police for unprovoked assault.

"No, I can't prove that Landson did it, an' I can't prove that the grass my steers eat turns to hair on their backs," he retorted, "but I reach my own conclusions. Is there any shootin' irons in the place?"

"Now, Dad, that's enough," said the girl, firmly. "There'll be no shooting between you and Landson. If there is to be anything of that kind I'll ride down ahead and warn him of what's coming."

"Darter," said Y.D.—it was only on momentous occasions that he addressed her as daughter—"I brought you over here as a guest, not as manager o' my affairs. I've taken care of those affairs for some considerable years, an' I reckon I still have the qualifications. If you're a-goin' to act up obstrep'rous I'll get Mr. Transley to lend me a man to escort you home."

"At your service, Y.D.," said George Drazk, who was in the crowd which had gathered about the rancher, his daughter, and Transley. "That Pete-horse an' me would jus' see her over the hills a-whoopin'."

"I don't think it would be wise to take any extreme measures, at least, not just yet," said Transley. "It's out of the question to suppose that Landson has picketed the whole valley with those stakes. It is now quite clear why we were left in peace yesterday. He wanted us to get started, and get a few swaths cut, so that he could know where to drive the stakes to catch us the next morning. Some of these machines can be repaired at once, and the others within a day or two. We will just move over a little and start on new fields. There's pretty good moonlight these nights and we'll leave a few men out on guard, and perhaps we can catch the enemy at his little game. Let us get one of Landson's men with the goods on him."

Y.D. was somewhat pacified by this suggestion. "You're a practical devil, Transley," he said, with considerable admiration. "Now, in a case of this kind I jus' get plumb fightin' mad. I want to bore somebody. I guess it's the only kind o' procedure that comes easy to my hand. I guess you're right, but I hate to let anybody have the laugh on me." Y.D. looked down the valley, shading his eyes with his hand. "That son-of-a-gun has got a dozen or more stacks down there. I don't wish nobody any hard luck, but if some accidental foot was to drop a cigar—"

"In that case I suppose you'd pray for a west wind, Dad," Zen suggested, "but the winds in these valleys, even with your prayers to direct them, are not to be too reliable."

"Everybody to work on fixing up these machines," Transley ordered. "Linder, make a list of what repairs are needed and Drazk will ride to town with it at once. Some of them may have to come out from the city by express. Drazk can get the orders in and a team will follow to bring out the repairs."

In a moment Transley's men were busy with wrenches and hammers, replacing knives and appraising damages. Even in his anger Y.D. took approving note of the promptness of Transley's decisions and the zest with which his men carried them into effect.

"A he-man, that fellow, Zen," he confided to his daughter. "If he'd blowed into this country thirty years ago, like I did, he'd own it by this time plumb to the sky-line."

When the list of repairs was completed Linder handed it to Drazk.

"Beat it to town on that Pete-horse of yours, George," he said. "Burn the grass on the road."

"I bet I'll be ten miles on the road back when I meet my shadow goin'," said Drazk, making a spectacular leap into his saddle. "'By, Y.D.!; 'by, Zen!" he shouted while he whirled his horse's head eastward and waved his hand to where they stood. In spite of her annoyance at him she had to smile and return his salute.

"Mr. Drazk is irrepressible," she remarked to Transley.

"And irresponsible," the contractor returned. "I sometimes wonder why I keep him. In fact, I don't really keep him; he just stays. Every spring he hunts me up and fastens on. Still, I get a lot of good service out of him. Praise 'that Pete-horse,' and George would ride his head off for you. He has a weakness for wanting to marry every woman he sees, but his infatuations seem harmless enough."

"I know something of his weakness," Zen replied. "I have already been honored with a proposal."

Transley looked in her face. It was slightly flushed, whether with the summer sun or with her confession, but it was a wonderfully good face to look in.

"Zen," he said, in a low voice that Y.D. and the others might not hear, "how would you take a serious proposal, made seriously by one who loves you, and who knows that you are, and always will be, a queen among women?"

"'By, Y.D.; 'By, Zen!"

"If you had been a cow puncher instead of a contractor," she told him, "I'm sure you would long ago have ended your life in some dash over a cutbank."

Meanwhile Drazk pursued his way to town. The trail, after crossing the ford, turned abruptly to the right from that which led across country to the North Y.D. For a mile or more it skirted the stream in a park-like drive through groves of spruce and cottonwood. Sunshine and the babble of water everywhere filled the air. Sunshine, too, filled George Drazk's heart. The importance of his mission was pleasantly heavy upon him. He pictured the impression he would make in town, galloping in with his horse wet over the back, and rushing to the implement agency with all the importance of a courier from Y.D. He would let two of the boys take Pete to the stable, and then, seated on a mower seat in the shade, he would tell the story. It would lose nothing in the telling. He would even add how Zen had thrown a kiss at him in parting. Perhaps he would have Zen kiss him on the cheek before the whole camp. He turned that possibility over in his mind, weighing nicely the credulity of his imaginary audience. . . . At any rate, whether he decided to put that in the story or not, it was very pleasant to think about.

Presently the trail turned abruptly up a gully leading into the hills. A huge cutbank, jutting into the river, barred the way in front, and its precipitous side, a hundred feet or more in height, kept continually crumbling and falling into the stream. These cutbanks are a terror to inexperienced riders. The valleys are swallowed up in the tawny sameness of the ranges; the vision catches only the higher levels, and one may gallop to the verge of a precipice before becoming aware of its existence. It was to this that Zen had referred in speaking of Transley's precipitateness.

Drazk followed the gully up into the hills, letting his horse drop back to a walk in the hard going along the dry bed of a stream which flowed only in the spring freshets. Pete had to pick his way over bowlders and across stretches of sand and boggy patches of black mud formed by little springs leaking out under clumps of willows. Here and there the white ribs of a steer's skeleton peered through the brush; once or twice an overpowering stench gave notice of a carcass not wholly decomposed.

It was not a pleasant environment, but in an hour Drazk was out again on the brow of the brown hills, where the sunshine flooded about and a fresh breeze beat up against his face. After all his winding in the gully he was not more than a mile from the cutbank.

"I reckon I could get a great view from that cutbank of what Landson is doin'," he suddenly remarked to himself. He took off his hat and scratched his tousled head in reflection. "Linder said to beat it," he ruminated, "but I can't get back tonight anyway, an' it might be worth while to do a little scoutin'. Here goes!"

He struck a smart gallop to the southward, and brought his horse up, spectacularly, a yard from the edge of the precipice. The view which his position commanded was superb. Up the valley lay the white tents of Transley's outfit, almost hidden in green foliage; the ford across the river was distinctly visible, and stretching south from it lay, like a great curving snake, the trail which wound across the valley and lost itself in the foothills far to the south; across the western horizon hung the purple curtain of the mountains, soft and vague in their noonday mists, but touched with settings of ivory where the snow fields beat back the blazing sunshine; far down the valley was the gleam of Landson's whitewashed buildings, and nearer at hand the greenish-brown of the upland meadows which his haymakers had already cleared of their crop of prairie wool. This was now arising in enormous stacks; it must have been three miles to where they lay, but Drazk's keen eyes could distinguish ten completed stacks and two others in course of building. He could even see the sweeps hauling the new hay, after only a few hours of sun-drying, and sliding it up the inclined platforms which dumped it into the form of stacks. The foothill rancher makes hay by horse power, and almost without the aid of a pitchfork. Even as Drazk watched he saw a load skidded up; saw its apparent momentary poise in air; saw the well-trained horses stop and turn and start back to the meadow with their sweep. And up the valley Transley's outfit was at a standstill.

Drazk employed his limited but expressive vocabulary. It was against all human nature to look on such a scene unmoved. He recalled Y.D.'s half-spoken wish about a random cigar. Then suddenly George Drazk's mouth dropped open and his eyes rounded with a great idea.

Of course it was against all the rules of the range—it was outlaw business—but what about driving iron stakes in a hay meadow? Drazk's philosophy was that the end justifies the means. And if the end would win the approval of Y.D.—and of Y.D.'s daughter—then any means was justified. Had not Linder said, "Burn the grass on the road?" Drazk knew well enough that Linder's remark was a figure of speech, but his eccentric mind found no trouble in converting it into literal instructions.

Drazk sniffed the air and looked at the sun. A soft breeze was moving slowly up the valley; the sun was just past noon. There was every reason to expect that as the lowland prairies grew hot with the afternoon sunshine a breeze would come down out of the mountains to occupy the area of great atmospheric expansion. Drazk knew nothing about the theory of the thing; all that concerned him was the fact that by mid-afternoon the wind would probably change to the west.

Two miles down the valley he found a gully which gave access to the water's edge. He descended, located a ford, and crossed. There were cattle trails through the cottonwoods; he might have followed them, but he feared the telltale shoe-prints. He elected the more difficult route down the stream itself. The South Y.D. ran mostly on a wide gravel bottom; it was possible to pick out a course which kept Pete in water seldom higher than his knees. An hour of this, and Drazk, peering through the trees, could see the nearest of Landson's stacks not half a mile away. The Landson gang were working farther down the valley, and the stack itself covered approach from the river.

Drazk slipped from the saddle and stole quietly into the open. The breeze was now coming down the valley.

CHAPTER V

Transley's men had repaired such machines as they could and returned to work. The clatter of mowing machines filled the valley; the horses were speeded up to recover lost time. Transley and Y.D. rode about, carefully scrutinizing the short grass for iron stakes, and keeping a general eye on operations.

Suddenly Transley sat bolt-still on his horse. Then, in a low voice:

"Y.D.!" he said.

The rancher turned and followed the line of Transley's vision. The nearest of Landson's stacks was ablaze, and a great pillar of smoke was rolling skyward. Even as they watched, the base of the fire seemed to spread; then, in a moment, tongues of flame were seen leaping from a stack farther on.

"Looks like your prayers were answered, Y.D.," said Transley. "I bet they haven't a plow nearer than the ranch."

Y.D. seemed fascinated by the sight. He could not take his eyes off it. He drew a cigar from his pocket and thrust it far into his mouth, chewing it savagely and rolling it in his lips, but, according to the law of the hayfield, refraining from lighting it. At first there was a gleam of vengeance in his eyes, but presently that gave way to a sort of horror. Every honorable tradition of the range demanded that he enlist his force against the common enemy.

"H—l, Transley!" he ejaculated, "we can't sit and look at that! Order the men out! What have we got to fight with?"

For answer Transley swung round in his saddle and struck his palm into Y.D.'s.

"Good boy, Y.D.!" he said. "I did you an injustice—I mean, about your prayers being answered. We haven't as much as a plow, either, but we can gallop down with some barrels in a wagon and put a sack brigade to work. I'm afraid it won't save Landson's hay, but it will show where our hearts are."

Transley and Y.D. galloped off to round up the men, some of whom had already noticed the fire. Transley dispatched four men and two teams to take barrels, sacks and horse blankets to the Landson meadows. The others he sent off at once on horseback to give what help they could.

Zen rode up just as they left, and her fine horse seemed to realize the tension in the air. His keen, hard-strung muscles quivered as she brought his gallop to a stop.

"How did it start, Dad?" she demanded.

"How do I know?" he returned shortly. "D'ye think I fired it?"

"No, but I just asked the question that Landson will ask, so you better have your answer handy. I'm going to gallop down to their ranch; perhaps I can help Mrs. Landson."

"The ranch buildings are safe enough, I think," said Transley. "The grass there is close cropped, and there is some plowing."

For a moment the three sat, watching the spread of the flames. By this time the whole lower valley was blanketed in smoke. Clouds of blue and mauve and creamy yellow rolled from the meadows and stacks. The fire was whipping the light breeze of the afternoon to a gale, and was already running wildly over the flanks of the foothills.

"Well, I'm off," said Zen. "Good-bye!"

"Be careful, Zen!" her father shouted. "Fire is fire." But already her horse was stretching low and straight in a hard gallop down the valley.

"I'll ride in to camp and tell Tompkins to make up a double supply of sandwiches and coffee," said Transley. "I guess there'll be no cooking in Landson's outfit this afternoon. After that we can both run down and lend a hand, if that suits you."

As they rode to camp together Y.D. drew up close to the contractor. "Transley," he said, "how do you reckon that fire started?"

"I don't know," said Transley, "any more than you do."

"I didn't ask you what you knew. I asked you what you reckoned."

Transley rode for some minutes in silence. Then at last he spoke:

"A man isn't supposed to reckon in things of this kind. He should know, or keep his mouth shut. But I allow myself just one guess, Drazk."

"Why Drazk?" Y.D. demanded. "He has nothin' to gain, and this prank may put him in the cooler."

"Drazk would do anything to be spectacular," Transley explained. 'He probably will boast openly about it. You know, he's trying to make an impression on Zen."

"Nonsense!"

"Of course it's nonsense, but Drazk doesn't see it that way."

"I'd string him to the nearest cottonwood if I thought he—"

"Now don't do him an injustice, Y.D. Drazk doesn't realize that he is no mate for Zen. He doesn't know of any reason why Zen shouldn't look on him with favor; indeed, with pride. It's ridiculous, I know, but Drazk is built that way."

Zen has a desperate encounter with Drazk. How do you think it came out?

JESUS TALKS WITH A SAMARITAN WOMAN

LESSON TEXT—John 4:4-42.

GOLDEN TEXT—"God is a Spirit: and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth."—John 4:24.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Talks With a Woman.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus and a Woman of Samaria.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—How Jesus Won the Samaritans.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Teaching of Jesus Concerning Himself.

1. The Occasion (vv. 4-6).

The growing popularity of Jesus aroused the envious opposition of the Pharisees, which obliged Him to leave Judea and go into Galilee. There was another way to reach Galilee, one used by many Jews to avoid contact with the despised Samaritans, the eastern side of the Jordan. He must needs go through Samaria in order to find this poor sinful woman and the needy citizens of Sychar. The great necessity which was upon Him was to seek and to save that which was lost (Luke 19:10). The wearied Jesus waiting at Jacob's well to speak to this poor, lost woman gives us a picture of the divine human Savior in His work of seeking lost humanity.

II. The Testimony of Christ to the Samaritans (vv. 7-41).

1. Discloses His Identity to the Woman of Samaria (vv. 7-26). This is a fine example of personal evangelism.

(1) A Favor Asked (vv. 7-9). He tactfully made a request which appealed to the woman's sympathy. Not only did the thirst of the weary traveler appeal to her but the fact that He being a Jew asked a favor of her showed His sympathy for her. In introducing the conversation He referred to that which was uppermost in her mind, namely water. This was the Teacher's point of contact. He soon passed from earthly water to the water of everlasting life which was in Himself. His aim was to bridge the chasm which separated them.

(2) Jesus' Tender Dealing With the Woman (vv. 10-15). He first appealed to her curiosity by declaring, "If thou knewest the gift of God" (v. 10). He knew the deep unrest of the soul of that sinful woman as she went on her way. He knew that if she really knew Him she would believe on Him and be saved from her sins. Therefore, the first thing was to get her attention. He followed this appeal to her curiosity by a promise which directed her attention to her deepest need. The deepest need of the soul Jesus only can satisfy. There is real and lasting satisfaction in Him and His gifts. The woman's reply, "Sir, give me this water, that I thirst not," is the inarticulate cry of every heart.

(3) The Woman Convicted of Her Sins (vv. 15-19). Jesus succeeded in arousing her interest but she did not really understand Him. Before she can understand what the water of life is she must be convicted of her sins. He skillfully gave the command which brought her face to face with the facts of her life which she was unwilling to confess.

(4) The Problem of Worship Submitted to Christ (vv. 2-24). This she did as soon as she perceived Him to be a prophet. This indicates that He was succeeding in bringing her mind to spiritual things. Jesus, knowing the inner life of this woman, tells her of the glad time, even then present, when true worshipers could hold intercourse with God anywhere. He showed her that the place of worship is unimportant, but the all-important thing is to have the true conception of God as brought through the Jews. He exposed the folly of a religion of form only and showed that acceptable worship depends upon the condition of the heart.

(5) Discloses His Identity to the Citizens of Sychar (vv. 40, 41). When they heard the testimony of the woman, they invited Jesus to come among them. Though they heard her testimony, their belief was due to Christ's own words.

III. The Testimony of the Samaritans (vv. 27-42).

1. The Woman of Samaria Witnesses for Christ (vv. 27-39). As soon as she was converted she became an enthusiastic missionary. This is as it ought to be and always will be. The soul that realizes Jesus cannot be still (John 1:41-45). The result of her testimony was that many believed on Him.

2. The Samaritans Witness for Christ (v. 42). They declared, "We know that this is indeed the Christ, the Savior of the World."

Begin Upon Yourself

If you must be severe, be sure that you begin with your severity upon yourself. Clean up your own life, and then with the beam taken out of your own eye you are in position to take the mote out of your brother's eye.—Gospel Herald.

If Willing to Repent

Dead churches cannot bring forth a genuine revival, but living churches can, by God's help, if people are willing to repent.—Gospel Herald.

AFRAID SHE COULD NOT LIVE

Operation Advised, But Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Made It Unnecessary

Glasgow, Kentucky. — "I was run-down, nervous, with no appetite. My side had given me trouble for five or six years. At times it was all I could do to live, and the doctor said I couldn't live but a short time longer without an operation. That was two years ago. My sister-in-law recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. She had never used it herself, but she said one of her neighbors suffered just like I did, and it cured her. After I had taken four bottles the pain left my side. I had a fine appetite to eat anything that was put before me, and I began to do all my work and my washing, something I hadn't done for years. I am a dressmaker, and this last fall I began suffering with my side again, so I began taking the Vegetable Compound again. I am on my fourth bottle, which makes eight in all I have taken. I feel so much better when I take it and everybody tells me I look better. My appetite improves and I feel stronger in every way. I am a very nervous woman and it seems to help my nerves so much."—Mrs. MAGGIE WALLER, Glasgow, Ky.

The Way of Life

This brief sermon by the wayside is from the Tifton Gazette: "Some men seem to make money without effort, while some women seem to annex more husbands than the law allows without any more effort. It's the other way round with some men, who can't make money no matter how hard they try, while some women find it utterly impossible to even annex the one husband allowed by law. But then, that's the way of life."

—o—

Every boy and girl in Shelby county who has not completed high school, who can possibly arrange to do so, should enroll in Shelby county high school this fall. Parents will find that no reasonable sacrifice is too great to give their children this opportunity.

—o—

Out of 150 cases on the criminal docket of the circuit court of Shelby county, 100 cases are for violations of the prohibition laws. Another reminder of what this willful organized effort to defy the laws is costing the people of Shelby county.

—o—

J. N. Wyatt, who for so long served as county agent of Shelby county, was a visitor to the Reporter Tuesday morning. He didn't stay long but he gave us a text for a mighty good agricultural sermon. He said: "Wherever I have organic matter in the soil I am making corn in spite of the drouth. We shall try to give the sermon later.

—o—

It is understood that federal officials are planning more vigorous prosecution of persistent violators of the prohibition laws. The assistant district attorney at Birmingham has asked that every man arrested the second time be reported to his office, stating that he will proceed against all such offenders in the federal court.

Dangerous ONLY to the Careless-

Safety is not a one-man job! Despite the precautions that the railroads have employed to safeguard the public against accident, and death, thru warning signals, watchmen, crossing gates, etc., preventable disasters continue to occur.

Do your part in the great safety campaign being conducted by this and other American railroads. Let the trains have the right of way; the tracks were made for them and they cannot change their course to prevent an accident. Wait until the train stops before you attempt to get on or off. Do not use railroad tracks as a passageway or a loitering place. They are dangerous only to trespassers. Help us save life and protect against accident.

The Louisville & Nashville Railroad spends nearly a million dollars a year for the single purpose of maintaining constant supervision over the condition of its tracks—850 track walkers are employed and every day they walk every mile of the main tracks of the road; inspecting rails, trestles, bridges, etc. When you are on the train, every precaution is taken for your safety. Do as much to protect yourself when off the trains.

Common sense—Caution—Co-operation—will pay big dividends in health and happiness.

DO YOUR PART.

DAIRY FACTS

CAREFULLY SELECT DAIRY HERD SIRES

Ninety-five per cent of the men who buy herd sires wait until they need one, then rush out to buy one ready for service. They don't know it, but they are following beaten paths. The successful breeder selects his herd sire when the general demand is lightest. As a result he gets a better bull at a lower price, says J. P. LaMaster, chief of the dairy division at Clemson college.

Some people have potatoes to sell in the seasons when potatoes are high in price. Some people have real estate to sell when the demand is greatest. But the ordinary man has potatoes to sell when prices are low, and is burdened with real estate because he can't sell it. The reason is that the ordinary man follows the beaten path. The other fellow finds out what people are doing generally and he does something else. He puts in more potatoes after a year when they don't sell, simply because he knows most of the others won't do that. He buys real estate just when almost everybody else wants to get rid of his; and he buys a herd sire during the season when demand is lowest.

This is practically all the difference between "just ordinary existing" and getting ahead. You can find out to which class you belong by asking yourself this set of questions:

When will I need a new herd sire?

Let us suppose you will need a new one before next March.

When will I look up a herd sire?

(If your answer is, "Oh, next fall when I'm not so busy," you belong to the "beaten-path gang." You will start out just when 95 per cent of the breeders start, you will buy one of the "left over" bulls and you will pay all the bull is worth.)

Now you have your choice between a great many good bulls. All these will be gone before fall to the successful 5 per cent. If you say, "I'm too busy now," you are following beaten paths. If you sit down this very day and line up your next herd sire, you can depend upon it, you will buy a better one than the luckiest member of the "beaten-path gang" will ever see.

Care and Attention Is Essential for Ringworm

The following is reported as a good cure for calves with ringworm: Wash the parts with strong soap and water to remove as much as possible of the crusts or scabs and, when dry, rub the spots with some of the following ointment: Flowers of sulphur, two ounces; oil of creosote, two drams; prepared lard, four ounces. This ointment should be applied each morning and evening. Painting the affected parts with tincture of iodine on alternate days is also very effective, but this agent should not be applied near the animal's eyes. The woodwork and the walls of the shed in which these calves are housed should be painted with hot limewash, to which has been added a couple of ounces of crude carbolic acid. With a little care and attention one should soon get rid of the trouble.

Easiest Way to Dehorn Is by Applying Caustic

The easiest and most really painless way to dehorn is to use caustic potash on the young calves. This caustic, should be applied on the buttons where the horns come out by the time the calves are a week old. The hair should be cut around the buttons and the skin around the horns rubbed with vaseline to prevent the caustic from burning. The stick of caustic is wrapped with paper to prevent it from eating the fingers, one end of the stick is moistened in water and rubbed on the horns until they become white. The caustic should not be wet enough so it will run down on the calf's head or into its eyes. This treatment will kill the horns, stopping further growth.

Clean Vessels and Warm Milk of Big Importance

A good rule to go by is never to feed a calf out of a pail you would not drink out of yourself or feed her any milk you would not be willing to drink. Feed the milk as warm as fresh milk from a cow. Keep the pens dry after calf has had her milk.

After the heifer is weaned then it is well to put some oil meal into the grain mixture. A good mixture much used is:

300 pounds wheat bran.
300 pounds cornmeal.
300 pounds ground oats.
100 pounds oil meal.

This is particularly desirable to u after weaning.

Cause of Bad Flavors

Bad flavors in cream and dair products are usually caused by carelessness in the care of the milk. ! a little dirt falls in the milk it becomes contaminated with bacteria which gives it bad flavors and if the milk is allowed to stand around the barn awhile before taken to the house and cooled it will often take on a bad flavor. The feeding of some sort of succulent feed will often help to overcome this; roots, cabbage, and silage are good.

MARY SUCCEEDS ON MAIN STREET

By LAURA MILLER

© by Laura Miller

THE DOCTOR ON MAIN STREET

Can a woman whose address is actually "115 Main street" be successful? Or is she so far from the center of things, so near the old-fashioned prejudices about man's place in the professions and woman's place in the home that even the profession which pre-eminently serves the home is a hopeless venture?

Dr. Blanche Haines of Three Rivers and Lansing, Mich., ought to be especially qualified to answer both these questions. She does actually live at that very Main street address. She is a success—if service is any criterion—in what has been for centuries the man's job of making sick folk, and keeping well folk, healthy.

Her title is a lengthy one, yet it describes only in part the scope of her work, which brings her into contact with some 5,000 people a year. She is director of the bureau of child hygiene and public health nursing of the Michigan department of health. There was a time when Doctor Haines and her doctor husband (and a good-looking one, too, she interjects) had time to practice medicine in the country town of Three Rivers in comfortable fashion. Between whiles she indulged in her passion for collecting antique furniture. "A country doctor who starts antiquing from Main street," she opines, "has a much more wonderful time than the 'antiquer' on the lower East side of New York."

Doctor Haines is so busy now with prenatal care and baby welfare that she has had to abandon antiques. Her physician father, who had to be mother as well, gave her not only his profession, but his habits of thinking straight, in the best man-fashion. Then she came under the influence of Susan B. Anthony, and found out the secret of working for and with women. Hence, as Michigan women have grown in power and opportunity for service, they have put Doctor Haines on many committees, most of them having to do with health.

Finally the state, following the example of the national government, has adopted the mother and baby educational measure known as the Sheppard-Towner act. Forthwith, Doctor Haines was called upon to make the written law into an actual benefit to those who most needed it. It is, as Doctor Haines says, primarily a rural problem of lowering infant and maternal death rates, outside the large cities, especially in isolated homes where modern medical knowledge penetrates slowly. And having lived on Main street in a small city is the one factor which Doctor Haines chiefly depends on to build success.

FEMINISTS, OR JUST FOLKS?

Cub reporters on city papers, according to women readers, love to turn their cynical vocabulary loose in articles about "lady legislators," "lady mayors" and others whom they conceive to be freak feminists. Unless somebody gets all the women mayors together, no one can know what sort they really are. But here is an actual interview—by mail—with one of them:

Two years ago Mary Paddock went to Florida. She had done her work, she felt, for two sons and four daughters to whom she had been both father and mother, were grown and gone out into the world. Driving south from Palm Beach she found what seemed the ideally peaceful spot in which she "might at least conscientiously indulge in a life of selfish ease with time to read and study and play."

"In the little village of Lantana, beside the still waters of beautiful Lake Worth, nestled a cottage. It was picturesque, inviting, yet secluded. Graceful coconut palms and fruit trees surrounded and shaded it. It was scarcely nine miles from Palm Beach, yet Lantana was a quiet, tiny village, barely incorporated. A few weeks later I found myself the happy owner of the cottage. My daughter was with me. My one idea seemed about to be fulfilled; here I should find peace and pleasure, living a quiet, leisurely life in ideal environment.

"But alas! Before many weeks the mayor of the little town was forced to resign on account of ill health. I was persuaded to allow my name to appear on the ticket to fulfill the unexpired term.

"You know the outcome. I woke up one day to find that I was a full-fledged mayor. I can't say that I felt any happiness over the honor conferred upon me. But I decided to do my best to make a success of this new and responsible undertaking.

"A charter for a town of a few hundred inhabitants," Mrs. Paddock imagines, "is as weird and wonderful an instrument as the one under which New York's Tammany Hall rose to fame. And a mayor's work is absorbingly interesting, when aided by Lantana folks' spirit of co-operation."

A Tactful Man

Sir Robert Baden-Powell can always be relied upon to tell a story worth retelling. At the recent dinner of the Federation of Rambling Clubs he related an amusing incident in which he and his wife were concerned while camping in a wood belonging to one of the newly rich.

Lady Baden-Powell asked permission to put up a tent in the wood. After some hesitation, sanction was forthcoming.

"But you must bring the general to see me," insisted the landowner.

Her ladyship pointed out the general, who was busy unharnessing the horse.

"That him?" exclaimed the landowner. "Good heavens! I thought he was tall, slim and—well, handsome!"

BROUGHT HOME FROM MEXICO ON STRETCHER

But Mrs. Herman Is Now in Good Health, Thanks to Tanlac.

A few years ago Mrs. M. E. Herman, 215 Hitchings St., San Antonio, Texas, "returned to the states from Monterey, Mexico," she says, "in such a low state of health that she had to be carried to her home on a stretcher." As time went on and she still lingered in the throes of "Nerve exhaustion, stomach disorders and bodily weakness," she determined, "on the advice of her druggist," to try Tanlac, which she declares "brought back my health and strength after I had almost despaired of ever getting well."

The results of Tanlac in the case of Mrs. Herman, while indeed remarkable, are by no means unusual for Tanlac, as many hundreds of people everywhere have testified to having taken the famous medicine with no less wonderful results.

"I returned from Mexico," said Mrs. Herman, "so thin and weak that I feared my life was going to be cut short. I could neither eat or sleep in a natural way and it seemed at times that heart palpitation and nerve exhaustion would take me away.

"The makers of Tanlac will always have my heartfelt thanks, for it is to Tanlac that I attribute my recovery and present good health. Tanlac is like a blessing from heaven to me, that is the way I think about it."

Tanlac is for sale by all good druggists. Accept no substitute. Over 40 Million bottles sold.

Tanlac Vegetable Pills, for constipation, made and recommended by the manufacturers of TANLAC.

BIG ULCER ALL HEALED

"Here is another letter that makes me happy," says Peterson, of Buffalo. "One that I would rather have than a thousand dollars.

"Money isn't everything in this world. There is many a big-hearted rich man who would give all he has on earth to be able to produce a remedy with such mighty healing power as Peterson's Ointment, to sell at all druggists for 60 cents a large box."

Dear Sirs:—

"I was an untold sufferer from old running sore and ulcers. I had tried most everything without any relief from pain. A friend told me of your wonderful ointment and the first box took away the pain that had not left me before in years, and after using just nine dollars' worth of the salve I am cured. The ulcer was 9 inches by 4½ inches, is all healed and I can walk. Never, never will I be without Peterson's again.

"You may use this to recommend your ointment, if you wish. I cannot say enough to praise it. Yours truly, Mrs. Albert Southcott, Lyndonville, N. Y." Mail orders filled by Peterson Ointment Co., Inc., Buffalo, N. Y.

Source of Mental Health

In society you will not find health. But in Nature. You must converse much with the field and woods if you would imbibe such health into your mind and spirit as you covet for your body. Society is always diseased, and the best is the sickest. There is no scent in it so wholesome as that of the pines, nor any fragrance so penetrating and restorative as that of everlasting in high pastures. Without that our feet at least stood in the midst of Nature, all our faces would be pale and livid.—Thoreau.

Must Produce Food

Compulsory cultivation of food crops has been ordered throughout several departments by the Peruvian government, in view of the persistent drought in that country. The haciendas and farms of the department of Inca and the provinces of Chancay, Lima, Callon ond Canete are required without exception to devote a minimum of 5 per cent of their cultivated lands to the exclusive sowing of articles of food.

WHY DRUGGISTS RECOMMEND SWAMP-ROOT

For many years druggists have watched with much interest the remarkable record maintained by Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder medicine.

It is a physician's prescription.

Swamp-Root is a strengthening medicine. It helps the kidneys, liver and bladder do the work nature intended they should do.

Swamp-Root has stood the test of years. It is sold by all druggists on its merit and it should help you. No other kidney medicine has so many friends.

Be sure to get Swamp-Root and start treatment at once.

However, if you wish first to test this great preparation, send ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a sample bottle. When writing, be sure and mention this paper.—Advertisement.

Warm and Cold-Blooded

Cold-blooded animals are those (mostly of the vertebrates of classes below birds) whose body temperatures vary with that of the water or air in which they live. Warm-blooded animals are those, such as birds and mammals, which have a relatively high and constant body temperature, usually considerably above that of the surrounding medium.

Many Home Owners

In this country more than 11 million families, embracing more than 50 million persons, own their homes, and 3¼ million farmers own farms covering more than 65 per cent of the private land in use. The homes and soil of the nation belong to the people.—David F. Houston in Harper's Magazine.

In the SUDAN

A Woman of the Sudan.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

The suggestion, pleasing to the Egyptians no doubt, that Great Britain abandon the Sudan as she had given up claims to Egypt, has brought forth the British statement that she will continue to consider the Sudan one of her important African protectorates.

The Sudan has for a long time been looked upon by the outside world as a sort of appendage of Egypt. Such conceptions have had to be somewhat revamped since the British apron-strings were cut from the old land of the Pharaohs and the Sudan has stood forth to a greater extent on its own responsibility. This in a thinly peopled land of amazing distances. You can go south from the Egyptian frontier six hundred miles by rail before you get to Khartum. From there south, you can go another thousand miles on a flat-bottomed, paddle-wheel Nile steamer before you reach the southern boundary of the Sudan, which is almost on the edge of the great lakes and a third of the way to the Cape of Good Hope.

Unless you refresh your memory by a look at a map of Africa you are likely to overlook the fact that the Sudan has a seacoast. South of Egypt it cuts across eastward to the Red sea and extends along that body of water for some 400 miles. Britain is by no means dependent on Egypt to furnish a door to this huge African realm. Two ports have been developed on the Red sea, Port Sudan and Suakin, and both are connected by modern railway facilities with hundreds of miles of the rich Nile valley including Khartum.

The White Nile splits the Sudan for nearly 2,000 miles from south to north and is navigable the year round above Khartum.

The Blue Nile runs down from the Abyssinian hills and joins the main river at Khartum, forming an apex called the Gezireh or "island." This vast flat island is the granary of the Sudan.

It is in the northern part of this Gezireh that the new irrigation projects are being undertaken. Engineers say land is the cheapest thing in the Sudan. Water is abundant, but labor is scarce.

Supplies Egypt With Food.

Egypt depends mainly on the Sudan for its meat supply, and thousands of acres of land have been put under pump irrigation to provide food crops for Egypt, whose people, as one investigator said, cannot subsist on bank notes and cotton.

Slavery, once so common along the Upper Nile, has been largely put down, except, perhaps, in the remoter regions. The country is almost treeless, especially north of Khartum; the few trees found are mostly species of acacia, known locally as the samr.

South of Khartum, to about 12 degrees north, narrow belts of sunt trees (another sort of acacia) line the banks of rivers. This sunt-wood is prized for boat-building, for tanning purposes, and is much used for fuel.

Farther south, on the White Nile where there is more rain, forest growths increase, and over in the Blue Nile country the giant baobabs (Adansonia digitata) and the Sudan ebony (Dalnergia melanoxylon) are found.

The Nile, of course, saves this region also from becoming an empty waste. Historic and important as this river is, its sources were for centuries shrouded in mystery. Early geographers advanced various odd theories; some said the Nile and the Ganges rose in the frozen mountains of north Asia, and other imaginative folk declared it came from "the Mountains of the Moon."

On its course through the Sudan the Nile is joined by the Bahr-el-Ghazal, the Sobat, the Blue Nile and the Atbara. The Bahr-el-Ghazal flows out of the vast, mysterious sudd swamps of the west; the other three streams run down from the east, bringing the drainage from the Abyssinian hills.

Sudd Swamps Are Curious.

In all Africa there is, perhaps, no greater natural curiosity than this famous sudd (Arabic for block), a sort of vast floating island of reeds, papyrus and small plants in the marshes formed by the lower reaches of the Bahr-el-Jebel and Bahr-el-Ghazal.

British scientists have estimated the sudd area at 35,000 square miles. One writer says: "To the eye the effect is one of a vast extent of brilliant green papyrus, feathery reeds and sword-grass, five to twelve feet above the water, broken by occasional patches of light ambach trees, with channels of water, pools and lagoons dotting the swampscape, and here and there a sparse tree or two on the horizon. . . . In the more southerly parts are found many varieties of game. Of the larger species, elephant, giraffe, buffalo and many sorts of antelope are seen, whilst the hippopotamus is excessively numerous. From the reeds and mud banks arise clouds of wild fowl—crane, geese, storks, herons, bustard, pelicans, spoonbill, ibis and duck of every description."

In the rainy, stormy seasons (and when the rivers have risen) these floating islands frequently change positions; here and there areas become detached from the main body and travel about, driven by the winds, often blocking the river's channel as an ice floe might do.

Lately, spurred on by the world's paper shortage, scientists have been giving attention to the vast papyrus accumulations in the sudd, with the hope of evolving some practicable method of paper manufacture.

So mixed is the native population of the Nile banks in the Sudan that it has been aptly named the "Negro Potpourri," though some ethnologists contend that these blacks are not really negroes.

Probably the Nubians, geographically and physically, are the real link between Egypt and the negro land. Though Moslems for centuries, they have kept their own dialects.

Something About the People.

The richness of the Nile valley has, century after century, lured so many invaders into it that today a veritable babel of races and tongues is found there. Apparently, the Moslem religion appeals strangely to the wild tribes of north Africa, and millions have adopted it. Many are carelessly called Arabs because they are Moslems, or because they can speak Arabic, or because they wear a picturesque makeup of town Arab and Bedouin garments.

"Invasion, however, is not the only disturbing element," a British military report says. "The natives of the Sudan, even when they have adopted a more or less settled life, are great travelers; traffic in human flesh and conquest for the sake of human flesh have nowhere been pursued so long and so thoroughly. The native changes his abode without hesitation, and his love of strange women is passing Solomon's.

"The real Arab appears to dominate the northern part of the Sudan, from Egypt to Kordofan, though he has nowhere exterminated the original inhabitants; he has in many cases not yet succeeded in forcing his own language on them, but he has intermarried freely with them, and the resulting mixture calls itself Arabian. It is an old saying in Egypt that you can't tell a Turk of the third generation from a native of the Nile country."

The Sudan, say the Egyptians, is an integral part of Egypt; but it was conquered, misgoverned and lost by successive khedives, and for years and years it was exploited by Egypt for ivory, gold and slaves. Both socially and ethnologically it differs from Egypt

Odd Use for Auto Bodies

For temporary protection of a river bank being undermined by floods and strong currents, approximately 2,000 discarded automobile bodies were sunk in depths of from 20 to 40 feet. Placed in a barrier along the shore line, the cast-off vehicle hulks formed a "mattress" to hold the land from slipping into the stream. Many that did not readily submerge were filled with rock. It is said that the plan checked erosion of the bank, until permanent dikes could be installed.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

J. M. LEONARD NAMED FOR NEXT MAYOR

Strong Ticket For Town Council.

J. M. Leonard, Jr., was nominated for mayor and W. L. Christian, F. G. Koenig, Thos. Minor, J. B. Turner and W. M. Polk were nominated for members of the town council of Columbiana at a mass meeting held at the court house Friday afternoon of last week. The mass meeting was attended by about fifty citizens who showed themselves deeply interested in the town and the meeting was perfectly harmonious.

Mayor L. H. Ellis was unanimously chosen to serve as chairman of the meeting.

The names of L. L. Saxon and J. M. Leonard, Jr., were presented as candidates for mayor. After the nomination of Mr. Leonard had been made, Dr. D. S. Lightcap, a member of the town council, made a brief talk calling attention to the fact that the the administration now finishing its term had been a business administration, it having succeeded in reducing a debt of over $2700 until by the end of this year the debt will not be over $700 He stated that in his opinion the present is a critical time and a most hopeful time in the history of Columbiana and he urged that care be taken to select for the council men well qualified for the responsibility and genuinely interested in the progress of the town. A committee to select ten men as candidates for membership in the council, five to be nominated was appointed by the chair as follows: E. A. Turner, J. J. Falkner, T. C. Rush, Max Lefkovits and W. E. Morrow. This committee reported the names of ten men, any five of whom it was said, would have made a good ticket and the five men named above were nominated Vote was as follows: W. L. Christian, 42, F. G. Koenig, 41; Thos. Minor, 23; J. B. Turner, 19; W. M. Polk, 19, D. S. Lightcap, 18; J. L. Mooney, 16; W. L. Farley, 15; W. E. Morrow. 12; W. L. Longshore, 10. The total number of votes cast was 43.

After the meeting was over one citizen who is himself deeply interested in the welfare of the town expressed himself as being gratified at this showing of interest on the part of so many; the best he had ever witnessed he said in a long residence in the town.

900 GALLONS LIQUOR POURED OUT FRIDAY

About 900 gallons of whiskey of all colors and seemingly of all grades was poured into the sewer at the jail Friday afternoon by Sheriff Falkner and his deputies. Besides the officers there were a few spectators, among them the visiting minister, Rev. J. O. Hanes and Mr. Stalnaker; Rev. R. W. Stuckey, Judge L. B. Riddle, and County Solicitor, P.O . Luck.

This large amount of liquor had accumulated as a result of the activities of the sheriff's forces during the past year. After each raid the liquor taken, is carried into the the jail and stored in a large steel cell, the key to which is carried by Sheriff Falkner himself. In order to be finally rid of it the sheriff has adopted the plan of pouring it out.

This is the second great pouring of moonshine liquor Sheriff Falkner has had since he took office a little more than a year and a half ago. The first one occurred on September 8th, when the officers poured out nearly 1000 gallons on the streets of Columbiana in the presence of a large crowd.

Mr. Little stated that he had three bales ready for the gin Friday. While leading the others this year with cotton, Mr. Little is not an all-cotton farmer. He has brought in some of the finest hay that has been offered on the local market, which he sold without any trouble at a good price.

Two More Girls Receive Montevallo Scholarships

Montevallo, Alabama, Sept. 1.—Mrs. Morris W. Bush, of Birmingham, has sent to President Palmer $500 to be used for two scholarships of $250 each for two of the disappointed applicants for the Birmingham News Scholarship. He has assigned these scholarships to the two girls who ranked third and fourth—Miss Eunice Foster, of the John H. Phillips High School Birmingham, and Miss Genevieve Allen of Gadsden.

It is hoped that there are other generous-hearted citizens who will give other scholarships of $250 each to aid more of these deserving girls to go to college. It is found that $250 will enable any girl to enter and continue one year at Alabama College.

C. G. Sharpe, Professor of Biology, who has been on leave of absence for six months doing graduate work at the University of Chicago, returned to Montevallo Saturday, ready to resume his duties in the college.

Miss Virginia Newton, of Athens, Georgia, graduate of Agnes Scott and also a Master of Arts graduate of Columbia University, has been appointed assistant in the department of English.

GRAND JURY IS IN SESSION THIS WEEK

Wesley Ozley Serves as Foreman

The Grand Jury for the fall term of circuit court of Shelby county was organized Monday afternoon with Wesley Ozley of Siluria, as foreman.

In a brief charge to the body, Judge E. S. Lyman called attention to the responsibility it had assumed as a necessary part of the machinery of law enforcement in the county and enumerated in detail some of the matters to which they were to give special attention. Among these was emphasizing the growing tendency throughout the county to hold the Sunday laws in contempt by parties carousing and dancing on Sunday, by merchants keeping their places of business open and other similar offenses. These things, Judge Lyman stated are in direct violation of the law and indictments should be returned against those found guilty of such practices.

Following Judge Lyman's charge Rev. B. B. Gay, R 3, Columbiana, who had been appointed to serve as bailiff of the grand jury, was called forwaard and the oath administered to him, after which the body retired to begin its deliberations.

RAILROADS SEEK TO ELIMINATE TRAINS

SHARP REDUCTION IN FREIGHT RATES IT IS CLAIMED WOULD FOLLOW DISCONTINUANCE OF TRAINS.

Birminghham.- Sharp reduction in freight rates or super railway service is expected to develop from the elimination of unprofitable passenger trains and agencies in this state, according to members of the Alabama public service commission. It was suggested that millions of dollars may be saved the shippers by the commission if the practice of operating only profitable runs and wrecking the unproftable ones is sustained by the public control bodies.

The intimations developed at the hearing in the Chamber of Commerce building by the commission of a petition by the Louisville and Nashville to discontinue passenger trains on the Praco line. It was stated that the rules of the National Labor Board controlled remuneration and that trainmen of the Praco run working four hours per day were paid on a basis of 300 miles for the work of 70 miles or paid on an eight hour basis with overtime after seven and one-half hours. Thus the crew is paid while remaining in Birmingham several hours during which time, railway officials testified, they could not be used in any service and that the compensation went on just the same.

Commissioner Morgan, after the hearing, said the L. & N. and the Southern were petitioning for the elimination of several runs which are unprofitable and the question was naturally suggested, whether only a profitable line was to survive and unprofitable ones taken off, even though a service is rendered the public by the retention of the unprofitabel operations. He said the railroads never came before the commission but what they had a mighty good case and invariably the commission was inclined to grant the eliminations where the situation was decided as one of the unprofitable operating units of a system. However he said if the campaign to discontinue lines continued there would be a tremendous savings to the railroads.

More evidence of returning prosperity was seen in Gadsden when it became known that the Dwight Cotton mill at Alabama City had cancelled the notice to its 1,200 operatives of a two weeks shut-down. It is understood this action was due to a better tone in the textile trade and increase of orders for the local plant. It is now running on a schedule of 50 hours a week, which is expected to be increased shortly. Announcement also was made that the shops of the Gadsden Pipe company and the Agricola Pipe company, which were shut down August 15, will resume on September 3.

Show Hints of Spanish Styles; New and Pretty Millinery Ideas

FOR the new season "Spain" is boldly written in many fashionable accesories of dress—or subtly introduced as a mere signature to others. The fancy of master designers roams the world over, looking for foundations upon which to build a vogue—and the picturesque and dashing modes of ancient and modern Spain have captured them, and are reflected in millinery, wraps, scarfs, sashes, veils, jewelry, materials and garments.

Distinctly Spanish, and Alluring.

The pose of the mantilla is carried out in wedding veils, the toreador hat and the Spanish sailor are everywhere evident in hat displays, gorgeous fringed and embroidered shawls and scarfs, complete afternoon and evening tollettes. A Spanish sailor, in black velvet, and a brilliant embroidered scarf, as pictured here, reveal the adaptation of these styles to present-day wear.

Now is the time for the possessor of a shawl—whether from Spain, China, India or elsewhere—to bring it out to the light of day and wear it. If it is of silk it may be worn as a shawl or as a scarf—but if it is heavier—as an India shawl, it is to be worn as a cape or draped into a loose wrap. It would be sacrilege to cut any of these old works of art and is not necessary since they are fashionable as they are.

Of course the large, ornamental comb is among Spanish revivals and even those of the shorn locks are beginning to manipulate a coiffure that will accommodate a pretentious comb. The Spanish influence also accounts for a great demand for lace in dresses with chantilly in the lead, followed by many beautiful, but inexpensive lace flouncings that make the most becoming and useful of frocks.

Not that we love the little, youthful, close-fitting hats less—but that we love a change more—therefore our new millinery for fall presents radical new departures in styles. It has taken on dignified and pretentious crowns and these necessitate brims. And upon brims rests the responsibility for the success of the new shapes; for women demand, above all things, becomingness in their hats. Brims undertake to make themselves subtly flattering and are endlessly varied, so that there is a hat for every face.

Four representative models, in the group shown here, reveal the dash and spirit of the new shapes. A high velvet hat appears at the top, with uneven, rolling brim, which is very soft about the face. A large wheel of moire ribbon and a fancy ornament trim it. Another velvet hat appears at the left, with brim turning sharply up at one side. A long velvet ear, fastened with a jeweled ornament adorns it. These velvet hats are made in black and various colors.

Many of the smaller shapes and some of the larger ones are covered with corded silk and this would prove a fine medium for a shape like that at the right. The very tall, upstanding trimming at the front is of velvet fastened with one of the new ivory ornaments. Heavy ribbon is often used for these tall trimmings.

There are many models in hatters' plush and other plushes among the new fall models, and nothing is more satisfactory for style or wearing quality. Satin is well represented, but just at present felt hats are more in demand than any others. The hat at the bottom of the group, trimmed with heavy, wide ribbon and small, silk ornaments, has a becoming and unique brim and might be developed in any of the popular millinery materials.

Pear Soup.

Cut into quarters eight large pears and simmer in three pints of water until tender. Press through a colander, or sieve that will retain the skins, letting the pulp through. Return pulp to kettle with grated rind of a half a lemon, six cloves bruised with a mallet until soft. Blend three tablespoonfuls of arrow root with one-fourth of a cup of water, stir into the kettle, stirring until the mixture boils. Add one-fourth of a cup of sugar, the juice of a lemon and a dash of white pepper. Garnish with maraschino cherries and serve cold.

Blueberry Muffins.

Sift together two cupfuls of flour, four teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one-half teaspoonful of salt and one-fourth cupful of sugar. Beat one egg, add three-fourths of a cup of milk and mix with the dry ingredients; add three tablespoonfuls of melted butter and when thoroughly mixed add one cupful of blueberries. Bake in hot gem pans twenty-five minutes.

Fruit Cup.—Prepare a lemon syrup using a little of the grated rind, one-half cupful of juice and two cupfuls of sugar; boil until thick, and cool. Prepare with a potato scoop enough balls from ripe musk melons. Fill sherbet glasses and pour over the lemon syrup, garnish with a fresh sprig of mint. Ginger sirup may be used if liked and if water melon balls are used any fruit juice which one likes may be used to flavor the sirup—pineapple is especially good.

Strength of character is not mere strength of feeling; it is the resolute restraint of strong feeling. It is unyielding resistance to whatever would disconcert us from without or unsettle us from within.—Dickens.

GOOD THINGS TO EAT

Meat with vegetable combination will serve a wholesome main dish with a small amount of meat, which will prove an advantage to both the purse and family.

Bird's Nest.—Mash six cooked potatoes, season to taste and add half a beaten egg; the mixture should be quite stiff. With buttered hands make into balls the size of an egg. Lay these in a shallow buttered tin quite far apart and press into each the bottom of a small cup, thus making nests. Brush with the remainder of the egg and a little water added and set into a hot oven to brown. Keep hot. While the nests are browning, run a half-pound of broiled steak through the meat grinder and add enough seasoned tomato sauce to moisten liberally; bring to a boil and with it fill the hot nests, laying on top two or three very small cooked and buttered onions. Serve on a hot platter with hot buttered toast on which is served buttered asparagus.

Roast Pig.—The pig should not be over six or eight weeks old. Wash and wipe dry after it is cleaned and prepared for roasting. Stuff with forcemeat used for stuffing duck, seasoning it more highly and mixing with beaten eggs. Stuff and sew up the opening, skewering the legs under the pig. Dredge all over with flour, place in a large pan and roast until well done, allowing half an hour for each pound. If the skin cracks during the last of the baking, rub it over with the drippings. Make a gravy from some of the fat, adding cider instead of water. Serve on a bed of watercress or parsley, garnished with an apple or lemon, a paper frill for the tail.

Fish Scallop.—Flake any sort of left-over fish, carefully removing the skin and bones; mix with a highly seasoned cream sauce; do not make it too moist. Place in buttered scallop shells. Pipe highly-seasoned mashed potato to which a beaten egg has been added, all over the top in whorls. Set in a hot oven until the tips of the potato are brown.

WHEN THE WHOLE NIGHT WAS HERS

Did you ever hear of Altrusa, which "tries to do for women what Rotary does for men?" If so, you have heard of Mamie Bass of Indianapolis and will enjoy the more her letter, dated July 17, about a fellow member:

"Today I had luncheon with Emma Bassett. She handed me your letter of July 12—and she a good promoter business woman, too: 'Read that,' said she, a little shamefaced, 'I haven't done anything worth telling about.'

"'No, of course not,' said I, 'nobody worth a red cent would think she had.' And then Emma began to tell me the story of her life, and I wish you might have sat at that table."

Space lacks to quote. A little Indiana town where "we were poor, and only those who have been poor in a small town know how poor a body can be and be respectable." Her father's death when the eldest child was six, boarders and interminable dishwashing for small Emma; fear that well meaning neighbors would prevail and the children would be "put out"; secret dream of "a beautiful house like the Smiths', a mother who could quit working and have nice clothes, and for herself, to be a teacher of English. An eleven-year-old's summer job a cash girl. Then the older sister died, there were extra bills, and Emma left school, found a job in a book binder's at $4 a week, "not much, but more than the dollar and a half of the department store. . . . I blush at this," interjects honest Miss Bass, "but perhaps Indianapolis is and was no worse than other cities."

Meanwhile Emma treasured the counsel of a beloved teacher, "Never mind, just do your work better than anyone else does it, and what seems a blind alley will open upon a beautiful park." Forewoman in a better shop, the girl of dreams made a lasting friend of the unusual woman manager.

Followed a period of unrest, a night course in stenography, a multigraphing machine for 75 precious dollars.

"She still kept her job at $12 a week," says Miss Bass, "but she had lots of time, oh, just lots of it—from 6 a. m. until 8, after a light lunch at her noon hour, and after 6 at night—'the whole night was mine,' she said. Perhaps it was her womanliness and her sincerity that brought business, but it was sheer hard work that got the work out on time. Today an organization with Mrs. Bassett's name on it is always a good investment. Her equipment is modern and she does quite a printing business besides her circular letters. And Emma Bass, who knows so well how to be a friend, has many friends in Indianapolis who prize her for sterling qualities."

THE UPSIDE DOWN FLYER

Cyle Horchem's letter head pulls your eye instantly over to the left hand margin. There in small blue letters is this:

FEATURING Flying
Upside Down

After you've puzzled that out, you go on and discover on the right and left margins other astonishing legends such as "Has Flown Approximately 300,000 Miles," or "Performing the Trapeze 2,000 Feet in the Air," and gradually your eyes come to rest on "If Done in the Air We Do It," when the conviction that Mrs. Horchem must have been learning these things since before airplanes were invented.

Then you discover—if you're as lucky as I was—the picture of an undeniably pretty girl, who isn't the least bit modest about the date of her birth. She discovered America, at Ransom, Kan., in March, 1899. Since then she's found time to get an education in Portland and Seattle. Her business success she's come back to the same country. Horchem's Aerial shows have headquarters in Wichita. But Mrs. Horchem explains that she has to be on the road pretty constantly—by which I take it she means in the sky!—so she gives her "home folks' address" at Ransom, just a girl who never goes even to the county seat.

In a letter written in July she told me that she had just made a woman's altitude record of 16,399 feet while flying at St. Louis on July 4.

She's been in commercial aviation four years, parachute jumping two years. (Somehow that simple record of a year or two years to learn a new form of control over herself and her machine gives one a thrilling realization of the hugeness of victory.)

As a regular job, Mrs. Horchem specializes on carrying passengers commercially. The last half year has kept her at this work very steadily. On her present notch stick of achievement she has chosen to keep the record of miles flown. Counting from January, 1923, she is aiming to make 20,000 miles before winter shuts down on her job of aerial taxi driver.

"YOU FIGHT WELL, ZEN"

SYNOPSIS. — Transley's haying outfit, after stacking 2,000 tons, is on its way to the big Y.D. ranch headquarters. Transley is a master of men and circumstances. Linder, foreman, is substantial, but not self-assertive. George Drask, one of the hands, is an irresponsible chap who proposes to every woman he meets. Transley and Linder dine with Y.D. and his wife and daughter Zen. Transley resolves to marry Zen. Y.D. instructs Transley to cut the South Y.D., "outa o' h—l an' high water" and a fellow named Landson. Drask proposes to Zen and is neatly rebuffed. Transley pitches camp on the South Y.D. and finds Landson's outfit cutting hay. Denison Grant, Landson's manager, notifies Transley that he is working under a lease from the legal owners and warns Transley off. All of which means war. Y.D. and Zen ride to the South Y.D. Zen is a natural vamp, not yet halter-broke and ripe for mating. Y.D. has taken a liking to Transley. Zen holds Transley off and encourages Linder. Zen enjoys the prospect of a race between Transley and Linder for her favor, but secretly laughs at both. She has another and more serious encounter with Drask. Y.D. mowing machines are ruined by iron stakes set in the grass. Zen prevents open war with Landson. Transley half-way proposes and is turned off. Drask resolves to burn out the rival outfit. Fire blazes up in the Landson stacks. The Y.D. outfit hastens to aid the enemy. Zen rides off alone to help.

"Then I'll change his style of architecture the first time I run into him," said Y.D. savagely. "Zen is too young to think of such a thing, anyway."

"She will always be too young to think of such a thing, so far as Drazk or his type is concerned," Transley returned. "But suppose—Y.D., to be quite frank, suppose I suggested—"

"Transley, you work quick," said Y.D. "I admit I like a quick worker. But just now we have a fire on our hands."

By this time they had reached the camp. Transley gave his instructions in a few words, and then turned to ride down to Landson's. They had gone only a few hundred yards when Y.D. pulled his horse to a stop.

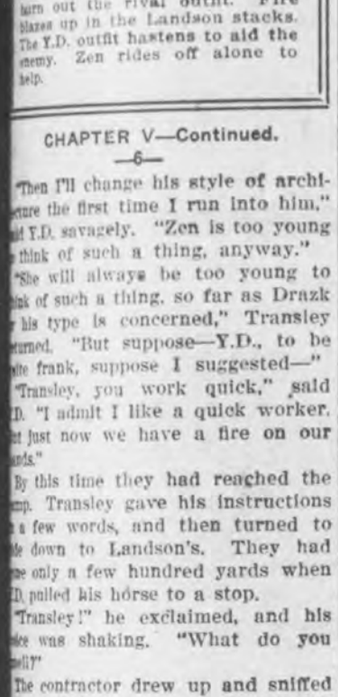
"Transley!" he exclaimed, and his voice was shaking. "What do you smell?"

The contractor drew up and sniffed the air. When he turned to Y.D. his face was white.

"Smoke, Y.D.!" he gasped. "The wind has changed!"

It was true. Already low clouds of smoke were drifting overhead like a broken veil. The erratic foothill wind, which a few minutes before had been coming down the valley, was now blowing back up again. Even while they took in the situation they could feel the hot breath of the distant fire borne against their faces.

"Well, it's up to us," said Transley grimly. "We'll make a fight of it. Got any speed in that nag of yours?"



They Had Gone Only a Few Hundred Yards When Y.D. Pulled His Horse to a Stop.

Without waiting for an answer he put spurs to his horse and set forward at a wild gallop into the smoke.

A mile down the line he found that Linder had already gathered his forces and had laid out a plan of defense. The valley, from the South Y.D. to the river, was about four miles wide, and across the full breadth of it was now burning the fire from Landson's fields. There was no natural fighting line; Linder had not so much as a buffalo path to work against. But he was already starting back-fires at intervals of fifty yards, allotting three men to each fire. A back-fire is a fire started for the purpose of stopping another. Usually a road, or a plowed strip, or even a cattle path, is used for a base. On the windward side of this line the back-fire is started and allowed to eat its way back against the wind until it meets the main fire which is rushing forward with the wind, and chokes it out for lack of fuel. A few men, stationed along a furrow or a trail, can keep the small back-fire from jumping it, although they would be powerless to check the momentum of the main fire.

This was Linder's position, except that he had no furrow to work against. All he could do was tell off men with sacks and horse blankets soaked in the barrels of water to hold the back-fire in check as best they could. So far they were succeeding. As soon as the fire had burned a few feet the forward side of it was pounded out with wet sacks. It didn't matter about the other side. It could be allowed to eat back as far as it liked; the farther the better.

"Good boy, Lin!" Transley shouted, as he drew up and surveyed operations. "She played us a dirty trick, didn't she?"

Linder looked up, red-eyed and coughing. "We can hold it here," he said, "but we can never cross the valley. The fire will be on us before we have burned a mile. It will beat around our south flank and lick up everything!"

Transley jumped from his horse. He seized Linder in his arms and literally threw him into the saddle. "You're played, boy!" he shouted in his foreman's ear. "Ride down to the river and get into the water, and stay there until you know we can win!"

Then Transley threw himself into the fight. As the men said afterwards, Linder fought like a wildcat, but Transley fought like a den of lions. When the wagon galloped up from the river with barrels of water Transley seized a barrel at the end and set it bodily on the ground. He sprang into the wagon, shouting commands to horses and men. A hundred yards they galloped along the fighting front; then Transley sprang out and set another barrel on the ground. In this way, instead of having the men all coming to the wagon to wet their sacks, he distributed water along the line. Then they turned back, picked up the empty barrels, and galloped to the river for a fresh supply. Soon they had the first mile secure. The back-fires had all met; the forward line of flames had all been pounded out; the rear line had burned back until there was no danger of it jumping the burned space. Then Transley picked up his kit and rushed it on to a new front farther south. At intervals of a hundred yards he started fires, holding them in check and beating out the western edge as before.

But his difficulties were increasing. He was farther from the river. It took longer to get water. One of the barrels fell off and collapsed. Some of the men were playing out. The horses were wild with excitement and terror. The smoke was growing denser and hotter. Men were coughing and gasping through dry, seared lips.

"You can't hold it, Transley; you can't hold it!" said one of the men.

Transley hit him from the shoulder. He crumpled up and collapsed.

A mile and a half had been made safe, but the smoke was suffocatingly thick and the roar of the oncoming fire rose above the shouts of the fighters. Up galloped the water wagon; made a sharp lurch and turn, and a front wheel collapsed with the shock. The wagon went down at one corner and the barrels were dumped on the ground.

The men looked at Transley. For one moment he surveyed the situation.

"Is there a chain?" he demanded. There was.

"Hitch on to the tire of this broken wheel. Some of you men yank the hub out of it. Others pull grass. Pull, like h—l was after you!"

They pulled. In a minute or two Transley had the rim of the wheel flat on the ground, with a team hitched to it and a little pile of dry grass inside. Then he set fire to the little pile of grass and started the team slowly along the battle front. As they moved the burning grass in the rim set fire to the grass on the prairie underneath; the rim partly rubbed it out again as it came over, and the men were able to keep what remained in check, but as he lengthened his line Transley had to leave more and more men to beat out the fire, and had fewer to pull grass. The sacks were too wet to burn; he had to have grass to feed his moving fire-spreader.

At length he had only a teamster and himself, and his fire was going out. Transley whipped off his shirt, rolled it into a little heap, set fire to it, and ran along beside the rim, firing the little moving circle of grass inside.

It was the teamster, looking back, who saw Transley fall. He had to drop the lines to run to his assistance, and the horses, terrified by smoke and fire and the excitement of the fight, immediately bolted. The teamster took Transley in his arms and half carried, half dragged him into the safe area behind the back-fires. And a few minutes later the main fire, checked on its front, swept by on the flank and raced on up through the valley.

In riding down to the assistance of Mrs. Landson Zen found herself suddenly caught in an eddy of smoke. She did not realize at the moment that the wind had turned; she thought she must have ridden into the fire area. To avoid the possibility of being cut off by fire, and also for better air, she turned her horse to the river. All through the valley were billows of smoke, with here and there a reddish-yellow glare marking the more vicious sections of flame. Vaguely, at times, she thought she caught the shouting of men, but all the heavens seemed full of roaring.

When Zen reached the water the smoke was hanging low on it, and she drove her horse well in. Then she swung down the stream, believing that by making a detour in this way she could pass the wedge of fire that had interrupted her and get back on to the trail leading to Landson's. She was coughing with the smoke, but rode on in the confidence that presently it would lift.

It did. A whip of wind raised it like a strong arm throwing off a blanket. She sat up and breathed freely. The hot sun shone through rifts in the canopy of smoke; the blue sky looked down serene and unmoved by this outburst of the elements. Then as Zen brought her eyes back to the water she saw a man on horseback not forty yards ahead. Her first thought was that it must be one of the fire fighters, driven like herself to safety, but a second glance revealed George Drazk. For a moment she had an impulse to wheel and ride out, but even as she smothered that impulse a tinge of color rose in her cheeks that she should for a moment have entertained it. To let George Drazk think she was afraid of him would be utmost humiliation.

She continued straight down the stream, but he had already seen her and was headed her way. In the excitement of what he had just done Drazk was less responsible than usual.

"Hello, Zen!" he said "Mighty decent of you to ride down an' meet me like this. Mighty decent, Zen!"

"I didn't ride down to meet you, Drazk, and you know it. Keep out of the way or I'll use a whip on you!"

"Oh, how naughty! Y.D. all over! Never mind, dear, I like you all the better for that. Who wants a tame horse? An' as for comin' down to meet me, what's the odds, so long as we've met?"

He had turned his horse and blocked the way in front of her. When Zen's horse came within reach Drazk caught him by the bridle.

"Will you let go?" the girl said, speaking as calmly as she could, but in a white passion. "Will you let go of that bridle, or shall I make you?"

He looked her full in the face. "Gad, but you're a stunner!" he exclaimed. "I'm glad we met—here."

She brought her whip with a biting cut around the wrist that held her bridle. Drazk winced, but did not let go.

"Jus' for that, young Y.D.," he hissed, "jus' for that we drop all formalities, so to speak."

With a dexterous spurring he brought his horse alongside and threw an arm about Zen before she could beat him off. She used her whip at short range on his face, but had not arm-room in which to land a blow. They were stirrup-deep in water, and as they struggled the horses edged in deeper still. Finding that she could not beat Drazk off Zen clutched her saddle and drove the spurs into her horse. At this unaccustomed treatment he plunged wildly forward, but Drazk's grip on her was too strong to be broken. The maneuver had, however, the effect of unhorsing Drazk. He fell in the water, but kept his grip on Zen. With his free hand he still had the reins of his own horse, and he managed also to get hold of hers. Although her horse was plunging and jumping, Drazk's strong grip on his rein kept him from breaking away.

"You fight well, Zen, d—n you—you fight well," he cried. "So you might. You played with me—you made a fool of me. We'll see who's the fool in the end." With a mighty wrench he tore her from her saddle and she found herself struggling with him in the water.

"If I put you under for a minute I guess you'll be good," he threatened. "I'll half drown you, Zen, if I have to."

"Go ahead," she challenged. "I'll drown myself, if I have to."

"Not just yet, Zen; not just yet. Afterwards you can do as you like."

In their struggles they had been getting gradually into deeper water. At this moment they found their feet carried free, and the horses began to swim for the shore. Drazk held to both reins with one hand, still clutching his victim with the other. More than once they went under water together and came up half choking.

Zen was not a good swimmer, but she would gladly have broken away and taken chances with the current. Once on land she would be at his mercy. She was using her head frantically, but could think of no device to foil him. It was not her practice to carry weapons; her whip had already gone down the stream. Presently she saw a long leather thong floating out from the saddle of Drazk's horse. It was no larger than a whip-lash; apparently it was a spare lace which Drazk carried, and which had worked loose in the struggle. It was floating close to Drazk.

"Don't let me sink, George!" she cried frantically, in sudden fright. "Save me! I won't fight any more."

"That's better," he said, drawing her up to him. "I knew you'd come to your senses."

Her hand reached the lash. With a quick motion of the arm, such as is given in throwing a rope, she had looped it once around his neck. Then, pulling the lash violently, she fought herself out of his grip. He clutched at her wildly, but could reach only some stray locks of her brown hair which had broken loose and were floating on the water.

She saw his eyes grow round and big and horrified; saw his mouth open and refuse to close; heard strange little gurgles and chokings. But she did not let go.

"When you insulted me this morning I promised to settle with you; I did not expect to have the chance so soon."

His head had gone under water . . . Suddenly she realized that he was drowning. She let go of the thong, clutched her horse's tail, and was pulled quickly ashore.

Sitting on the gravel, she tried to think. Drazk had disappeared; his horse had landed somewhat farther down. . . . Doubtless Drazk had drowned. Yes, that would be the explanation. Why change it?

Zen turned it over in her mind. Why make any explanations? It would be a good thing to forget. She could not have done otherwise under the circumstances; no jury would expect her to do otherwise. But why trouble a jury about it?

"He got what was coming to him," she said to herself presently. She admitted no regret. On the contrary, her inborn self-confidence, her assurance that she could take care of herself under any circumstances, seemed to be strengthened by the experience.

She got up, drew her hair into some kind of shape, and scrambled a little way up the steep bank. Clouds of smoke were rolling up the valley. She did not grasp the significance of the fact at the first glance, but in a moment it impacted home to her. The wind had changed! Her help now would be needed, not by Mrs. Landson, but probably at their own camp. She sprang on her horse, recrossed the stream, and set out on a gallop for the camp. On the way she had to ride through one thin line of fire, which she accomplished successfully. Through the smoke she could dimly see Transley's gang fighting the back-fires. She knew that was in good hands, and hastened on to the camp. Zen had had prairie experience enough to know that in hours like this there is almost sure to be something or somebody, in vital need, overlooked.

A Half Hour's Hard Riding Brought Her to Lint's.

She galloped into the camp and found only Tompkins there. He had already run a little back-fire to protect the tents and the chuck-wagon.

"How goes it, Tompkins?" she cried, bursting upon him like a courier from battle.

"All set here, ma'am," he answered. "All set an' safe. But they'll never hold the main fire; it'll go up the valley h—l-scootin',—beggin' your pardon, ma'am."

"Anyone live up the valley?"

"There is. There's the Lints—squatters about six miles up—it was from them I got the cream an' fresh eggs you was good enough to notice, ma'am. An' there's no men folks about; jus' Mrs. Lint an' a young herd of little Lints; least, that's all was there las' night."

"I must go up," said Zen, with instant decision. "I can get there before the fire, and as the Lints are evidently farmers there will be some plowed land, or at least a plow with which to run a furrow so that we can start a back-fire. Direct me."

Tompkins directed her as to the way, and, leaving a word of explanation to be passed on to her father, she was off. A half hour's hard riding brought her to Lint's, but she found that this careful settler had made full provision against such a contingency as was now come about. The farm buildings, implements, stables, everything was surrounded, not by a fire-guard, but by a broad plowed field. Mrs. Lint, however, was little less thankful for Zen's interest than she would have been had their little steading been in danger. She pressed Zen to wait and have at least a cup of tea, and the girl, knowing that she could be of little or no service down the valley, allowed herself to be persuaded. In this little harbor of quiet her mind began to arrange the day's events. The tragic happening at the river was as yet too recent to appear real; had it not been for the touch of her wet clothing Zen could have thought it all an unhappy dream of days ago. She reflected that neither Tompkins nor Mrs. Lint had commented upon her appearance. The hot sun had soon dried her outer apparel, and her general disheveled condition was not remarkable on such a day as this.

Having Killed Drazk, what is Zen going to do about it?

Lesson for September 7

JESUS HEALS A NOBLEMAN'S SON

LESSON TEXT—John 4:46-54.

GOLDEN TEXT—"I am the way, the truth, and the life."—John 14:6.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Heals a Sick Boy.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Heals a Nobleman's Son.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Belief in Jesus—What It Has Done and Will Do.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—What Should We Expect From Faith?

The glorious revival among the Samaritans being over, Jesus, with heart yearning for His countrymen, goes back into Galilee. When He began His work there it was not appreciated as it should have been. His own testimony is that a prophet hath no honor in his own country. Having made a reputation elsewhere He now came back to them.

I. The Nobleman's Earnest Plea (vv. 46, 47). This father's heart was in deep anguish because of the critical illness of his son, but he had the good sense to go to Jesus in his distress. Parents should eagerly bring their children to the Great Physician. This affliction was used to bring him to Jesus. Many do not think of Jesus until overwhelmed with grief and distress. It is need that always brings men to Jesus. Even when human physicians fail the case is not hopeless, for there is no case too hard for Christ and there is no disease too difficult nor sorrow too great but relief can be found in Him. This is true of our physical ills, but it is pre-eminently true of our souls. We see here that a rich and influential man is in distress, showing that the rich and exalted are no more exempt from afflictions and anxiety than are the poor. Cares and trouble come to all alike. The young are liable to disease and death as are the old. This nobleman learned of Jesus through the testimony of another (v. 47). Had not some one told him about Jesus he would not have called upon Him. Before lost men can call upon the Lord some one must tell them about Him (Rom. 10:14, 15).

II. The Testing of the Nobleman's Faith (vv. 48, 49).

In his experience we find an illustration of the development of belief. He had faith, but not an intelligent faith. Before help could be given his attitude of mind must be changed. Jesus declared, "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe," showing that the nobleman's faith was such as was based upon signs nad wonders. The man needed something more than the healing of his son. He must needs know Christ as Savior as well as Healer. He did not allow himself to be put off, but insistently demanded, "Sir, come down ere my child die." This shows that he was now willing to make any experiment to save his boy. His very impotency forced him to lay hold upon the Lord. Jesus desired this man to possess a faith which was based upon His naked word, not mere signs and wonders. The way of Jesus is to first reveal Himself as a Savior and then as a Healer.

III. The Nobleman's Faith Victorious (vv. 50-54).

Through his testing he passed with good advantage. He is now ready to receive the Lord's own word, "Go thy way; thy son liveth." These words created true faith and the man stepped out upon them. Because he believed the words that Jesus spoke unto him he went his way. Faith increases in brightness the longer it is exercised. The foundation upon which he reposed his faith was the words of Jesus. On his return his faith met with confirmation. His servant met him and told him that his son was alive. Upon inquiry he found that the recovery of his son was from the very hour in which Jesus spake the words. This was such an unmistakable evidence of the deity of Jesus that not only the nobleman, but his household, was won for Christ. This affords us an example of the beauty of household religion. May we all learn that the words of Jesus are reliable. That which He promises is just as sure as though it had already come to pass. The salvation of the one who believes in Jesus is just as sure as though he had been in heaven and seen his name in the Book of Life. Anxiety for the son brought salvation to the whole house.

Evangelism

"Evangelism is not merely a work of love. It is the sheer law of self-preservation. The heathenism which is creeping along the fences of society is scattering its seeds on both sides. If Christians do not make the world better, the world will surely make the church worse."—Herald of Holiness.

Innocent Revenge

He that has learned with meekness and quietness to forgive injuries and pass them by, has found the best and surest way of baffling and defeating them; nay, it is a kind of innocent revenge.—Matthew Henry.

DIVIDENDS

Are Necessary to the Progress and Development of any Business

Invested money must earn money, or there will be no new capital forthcoming with which to take care of increased volume. This theory is elemental and the statement is trite; yet it is interesting to know that nearly one half of America's second largest industry pays no dividends on its capital stock. Three billion dollars worth of stock in railroads (of the approximately seven billion dollars outstanding) is not earning or paying a dividend.

What is the reason for such a condition existing? How long can this continue? How long will investors be willing to put their money into such non-profitable securities?

The first question is easy to answer: "Increased operating expenses without proportionate increased revenues." The second and third questions cannot be answered until the American people, through their lawmakers, evidence a keener appreciation of the railroads' problems, and in some quarters a fairer and less radical attitude toward the carriers.

In order to serve the Nation with adequate freight and passenger transportation, the railroads must have new capital to take care of needed improvements and extensions. New capital will not come when capital already invested is not paying a fair return.

Babylon's Records

Cuneiform Document of Babylon.

Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

The loss of a pen today is not of much consequence; but if one of our pens could be found in perfect condition 4,000 years from now it might tell the scholars of that future day many interesting things about our civilization. Archeologists dug up a few weeks ago on the site of ancient Kish, near Babylon, the oldest known pen in the world, and it has helped to piece out a fascinating picture of life in that region where man probably first built cities and lived an ordered, law-guided existence.

One has a tendency to look upon this old civilization as little known to the modern world. But thanks to "pens" such as the bone stylus recently unearthed in Mesopotamia and the unfading and ineradicable marks which they made on soft clay, subsequently baked, we know more of the history of certain eras in Babylonia and Assyria than we do of that of many comparatively modern states.

One of the surprises these clay documents afford are the striking likenesses of a civilization of 4,000 years ago to that of the Twentieth century. One scholar avers that "a right-thinking citizen of a modern city would probably feel more at home in ancient Babylon than in medieval Europe."

Another astounding revelation of these writings is that Israel, instead of being one of the foremost nations of antiquity, was a small power, relatively inconspicuous. Moreover, instead of the patriarch, Abraham, belonging to the beginning of time, humanly considered, it is now found that he occupies a middle chapter in the history of mankind.

Tablets Reliable Records.

In one respect the historian of these early times has an advantage over his colleague who seeks details in documents written on paper. The baked and sun-dried tablets of the Babylonians may be hard to decipher but, when read, they are "original sources," reliable, and not altered or revised by subsequent generations.

The well-kneaded clay, which had been washed to free it from grit and sand, while in a plastic condition was shaped into the form and size desired. As the style of paper used at the present time is frequently an indication of the character of the writing, the same is true, in a general way, of an ancient Babylonian clay tablet or cylinder. In most instances the trained Assyriologist at a glance can determine the character, in a general way, of an inscription by its shape or appearance.

The stylus with which these remarkable cuneiform records were made is seen at its best in the recent discovery at Kish. That implement is a little rod of bone about six inches long, triangular in cross-section, cut off sharply at one end so that when this end was pressed into damp clay it left wedge-shaped impressions.

The civilization that these little three-cornered jabs picture for us is astounding. Life was about as thoroughly organized and carefully regulated as our own. Even the ills of present day civilization existed in Babylon. Raids on gay road-house parties were common. Wine selling was regulated and the enforcement was put squarely up to the vender.

A maid might sue for breach of promise, a landholder had to pay a heavier tax if he did not cultivate his allotment, guardians were provided for estates of widows and orphans.

Formal contracts and deeds had to be attested by a notary, and in swearing the person taking the oath raised his right hand. An official copy of the transaction, on a clay tablet, with the notary's attestation was deposited in the temple, the court house of those days.

Interest Rates Were High.

There was an excellent reason for having one's rent promptly in Babylon, for creditors could seize one of the debtor's household for a hostage and hold him until a satisfactory settlement was made. Interest rates were rather discouraging, also, "the usual rate" referred to on clay tablets being 20 per cent. Instead of a penalty of 10 per cent as provided in modern notes if legal steps must be taken to collect, Babylonian notes provided for the doubling of the debt.

The discovery of the bone stylus at Kish not only helps to an understanding of an ancient civilization; it discloses a class of implements that has been more important to the development of all civilization than perhaps any other group of tools.

Man is even more truly distinguished as a "writing animal" than as a "speaking animal," for it is the growing fund of knowledge set down on various surfaces by various implements, and so passed on to generation after generation that has made possible development in the arts, sciences and industries. Back of the Kish stylus are more primitive members of the pen family; chisels to cut into stone and wooden tablets, thorns to scratch on hides, flint splinters with which to furrow cave walls, bones and sticks with which to make probably the first rude marks of all in sand or dirt. In a parallel line, stretch back the fewer ancestors of the pencil; bits of lead, lumps of chalk and soft earths, and the ends of charred sticks.

After the Scratching Tools.

The descendants of the Babylonian stylus and the scratching tools that preceded it present a startling array of implements and mechanisms. In China and Egypt paper and papyrus were invented to supersede the cruder and heavier writing surfaces and the great forward step was made of applying a third substance, ink, by means of a brush or pen. The Egyptian reed pen made of a hollow tubular stem may be looked upon as the direct ancestor of the modern pen. It had practically the form of its present-day descendant, being pointed and slit to make it pliable.

The early Greeks and Romans, however, did not use any material comparable to paper. The first scribbled with chalk on broken bits of pottery, or scratched with pointed metal rods on wooden blocks. Their next step was to cover the blocks with wax and scratch their messages in that material. Their styli had knobs on one end used to smooth out erroneous marks. New wax could be applied and the tablets used over and over. The metal styli were truly as mighty as swords, serving as daggers when desired.

When papyrus reached Greece and Italy the reed pen and the use of ink went with it. This combination was also used in writing on sheepskin parchment and vellum, and in the hands of slave, and later monkish copyists, went into the making of the world's most highly prized illuminated manuscripts and hand-wrought books.

Quills, chiefly from goose feathers, furnished the next source for improved pens. Not until the Nineteenth century did detachable metal pen points come into general use and shoulder quills out. Now something like three million gross of them are made yearly in the United States alone.

The steel and gold pens and even the latest models of fountain pens do not complete the pen genealogy. The far-off bit of bone or flint used by the less dumb savage who recorded an unimportant event many thousand years ago was truly the original ancestor to our typewriters, our etching needles, the light rays and acids we have harnessed to make our halftones, and the gigantic, thunderous printing presses that grind out their millions of newspapers, magazines and books.

Liner Without Funnels

The number of funnels on an ocean liner has been a popular gauge of the grandeur of the vessel, but the Oorangi, recently launched on the Clyde, has no funnels. The vessel is fairly called the first motor-driven passenger liner. She has a displacement of 23,000 tons and a speed of 18 knots. Four sets of six-cylinder Diesel engines deliver 13,000 horsepower, which is applied to four screws. The Oorangi will ply between Vancouver and Australia, a route long enough to make economizing fuel and fuel space of considerable importance.—Youth's Companion.

PREVENTING HOUSEHOLD ACCIDENTS

HOUSEHOLD accidents are more common than is generally believed.

They are are usually the result of ignorance or carelessness.

They are largely preventable.

In "National Safety News," Miss Jacobus, superintendent of district nursing at Worcester, Mass., tells of a few of the home accidents cared for by her nurses.

A two-year-old child had a convulsion due to indigestion. The mother telephoned the doctor who said "Put the child in a hot bath. I'll get there as soon as possible." The mother filled a small tin bathtub and put it on the stove to heat. When the water felt hot, she put the child in, forgetting, in her excitement, that the tin bottom of the tub was far hotter than the water. The child's back, legs, and head were so badly burned as to cripple it hopelessly.

A ten-year-old boy left a drumstick on the stairs. His mother slipped on it, fell, injured her spine, and was paralyzed for the rest of her life.

A mother carelessly left a broom standing near a door. Her child opened the door. The broom fell, striking the child in the eyes and destroying his sight.

A woman caught her shoe on a loose nail in the floor. She fell against a window-pane, cutting an artery, and died from hemorrhage before she could be rescued.

A mother was doing some household sewing when her little girl asked for a cracker. The mother got up to give it to her and stuck her needle in the front of her waist. Then she picked up the child and gave her a vigorous hug. The needle ran into the child's stomach, the wound became infected, and a serious illness and an operation were the result.

A nurse carelessly left a bottle of bichloride of mercury on a table beside a bottle of medicine. The patient, a young college student, woke up in the night, took a dose of medicine, as he thought, in the dark, and died of mercurial poisoning.

A father slipped on a piece of orange peel left on the kitchen floor, broke his leg, was a month in the hospital, and lost three months' wages.

Household accidents are unnecessary and largely preventable.

Don't take a chance. It may cost a life.

PREVENTING DIPHTHERIA

SOME diseases, such as cancer, cannot be prevented because their causes are not known.

Until the causes of these diseases are are discovered, they may be reduced or controlled, but they cannot be stamped out.

Other diseases are due to known causes but these causes cannot as yet be controlled.

Such a disease is pneumonia. We know that it is caused by inhaling a certain germ, but we do not know how to prevent it.

Still other diseases are due to causes which can be controlled. These diseases can be entirely prevented.

In 1883, Kleb discovered the diphtheria germ. Ten years later, antitoxin was discovered. Its use has greatly reduced the diphtheria death rate. If every child who contracts diphtheria were given antitoxin in the first two days of the attack, there would be no deaths from diphtheria.

This was a great discovery, but it did not prevent diphtheria. It only saved the child after it was infected.

Then the Schick test was devised, by which it is possible to tell whether the apparently healthy child is susceptible to diphtheria.

Finally, toxin-antitoxin made it possible to make every child immune to diphtheria infection, just as smallpox vaccination protects the individual against this loathsome disease.

If every child, on entering the public school, were given toxin-antitoxin, there would be no diphtheria among school children.

Why is this disease-preventing treatment not used more generally? As King Edward asked, "If preventable, why is it not prevented?"

There are just two reasons—ignorance and carelessness.

We have all the knowledge we need to wipe out this terrible scourge of child life.

For every case of diphtheria today some ignorant or careless parent is responsible.

At Mooseheart, the great school of the Loyal Order of Moose, 1,200 children of deceased members are cared for and educated. Epidemics of diphtheria used to be common in the school.

In 1918, Dr. John Nichols, the resident physician, began giving toxin-antitoxin to every child. In the six years since this treatment was begun there have been just two cases of diphtheria, both in the first year. There has not been a single case since 1920.

The same results can be secured everywhere, if the same methods are adopted.

Diphtheria can be entirely prevented.

Don't risk your child's life by your ignorance or carelessness.

WHEY AND MANY DIFFERENT USES FOR IT

Whey Lemonade Is Quite Refreshing.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Just as buttermilk represents what is left from cream in butter making, so whey represents what is left from milk in cheese making. Though less nutritious than buttermilk and skim milk, since it contains less protein, whey may be substituted for them in making bread and other cooked foods, and it is also useful in some cases as a mild laxative drink for invalids.

Whey that differs little in composition from regular cheese whey, may be made at home by cooking sweet milk with some acid material, such as vinegar, lemon juice, or cream of tartar, or even with sour milk, according to the United States Department of Agriculture. Fresh curds and whey is an old-fashioned dish still used to some extent, though less common than it was when cheese making was regularly carried on in the home.

Whey Lemonade and Punch.

1 quart whey.
6 tablespoonfuls sugar.
Juice of 2 lemons.
Slices of lemon or a little grated or diced rind, nutmeg or cinnamon.

Mix, chill and serve as a beverage.

Variations.—Double the quantity of lemon juice and of sugar and add other fruit juices and a little fruit cut in small pieces. This transforms whey lemonade into whey punch. Set the punch away to chill and ripen; serve with crushed ice if desired. Rhubarb, pineapple, grape, currant and cherry juices lend themselves well to whey punch. A sprig of freshly crushed mint is sometimes added. Nutmeg or cinnamon will overcome any characteristic whey flavor. Whey punch may be frozen if desired.

Whey Honey.

1 cupful whey.
1-3 cupful sugar, either white or brown.
½ cupful corn sirup.

Mix whey and sugar and boil the mixture till it is of the consistency of strained honey. This sirup will keep indefinitely if properly bottled and is delicious for spreading on waffles or pancakes. Used a little thinner it makes an excellent pudding sauce. Since it requires no thickening it is the easiest possible sauce to make.

RICE IS EXCELLENT BASIS FOR SALADS

Useful Also in Fixing Up Left-Overs of Many Kinds.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Cold boiled rice, if very dry and flaky, is an excellent basis for many salads and may be the means of using left-overs of vegetables, fruits, meat, or fish, says the United States Department of Agriculture. For instance, left-over peas, carrots, green beans, or fresh tomatoes may be combined with left-over rice, and small amounts of fresh fruits may be used in the same way. Grapefruit makes a delicious salad served with rice and French dressing. Plain, cold boiled rice or cold pressed rice may be served with lettuce with a hot or cold cheese dressing or with mayonnaise. Either adds greatly to the nutritive value of the dish and gives it a distinctive flavor. Because of its texture, rice readily takes up the flavor of any dressing.

Souffle of Peas Useful for Luncheon or Supper

Lima beans, split peas, cowpeas or fresh or canned green peas may be used to make a luncheon or supper dish that is fairly substantial, says the United States Department of Agriculture.

4 tablespoonfuls flour
4 tablespoonfuls fat
1 cupful skim milk
1 cupful mashed cooked peas (any kind)
3 eggs
1 teaspoonful salt
⅛ teaspoonful pepper
Few drops of onion juice

Make a white sauce from flour, fat and milk. Mash the cooked peas to a pulp. Beat white and yolks of eggs separately. Mix vegtable pulp, seasonings, sauce and well-beaten yolks. Fold in stiffly beaten whites, put in greased baking dish and bake in slow oven until firm.

Stuffed Green Peppers

6 green peppers.
2¼ cupfuls fresh corn.
½ onion cut up fine.
1½ cupfuls meat chopped or ground fine.
Dash of pepper.
1½ cupfuls meat stock thickened with 2 tablespoonfuls flour.
1½ cupfuls bread crumbs.
½ teaspoonful salt.

Remove the tops and seeds from the peppers and parboil in boiling water for two minutes. Remove from the water, drain, and put in a casserole. Stuff the peppers with a mixture of the corn, onion, meat, bread crumbs, thickened stock mixture, and seasoning and bake. Canned corn may be used. The mixture may be varied by using other materials such as rice and tomatoes, suggests the United States Department of Agriculture.

LAMB FOREQUARTERS ECONOMICAL MEAT

Several Excellent Ways of Cooking Are Suggested.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

A breast of lamb, mutton or veal, sometimes presents a problem, as it contains more fat and skin and less meat than other parts of the lamb, and yet it is often economical to buy an entire forequarter of lamb, or necessary to dispose of this part when slaughtering on the farm. One way to prepare a breast is to make a pocket under the skin, fill it with bread stuffing and bake it, so that the thin layer of meat is protected by the stuffing from drying out. Other good ways of preparing a forequarter of lamb or mutton are suggested by the United States Department of Agriculture. They apply equally to a breast of veal.

Braised Breast of Lamb or Mutton.

Season a breast or shoulder of lamb or mutton, place in a covered casserole or roaster and surround by vegetables prepared as in the following recipe. Add a little water, cover the pan closely, and cook in a slow oven until the meat is tender, probably from an hour and a half to three hours.

Breast of Lamb With Vegetables.

Season a breast of lamb with salt and pepper and simmer until the bones can be slipped out easily. Remove from the water. In the meat stock cook vegetables such as turnips, carrots, celery, or onions cut in small pieces, green beans, peas, and okra. More salt may be needed. A few potatoes cut small may be added to cook during the last 20 minutes.

Remove the bones from the meat, fold it together, and secure with small skewers or twine. Dredge with flour and brown on both sides in hot fat. Place on a hot platter and surround it with the vegetables which have been well drained. Use the meat stock for soup, skimming it when cold.

Preferred Combination of Meat and Vegetables

Among the many combinations of meat and vegetables which constitute a stew, the recipe below is preferred in parts of Virginia and Georgia, and is one of the dishes made popular by canning club girls under the direction of the United States Department of Agriculture and the state agricultural colleges.

The meat should be cut up in pieces and browned before stewing. A sour sauce may be made of vinegar, tomato catsup, a little worcestershire sauce and pepper to taste. The meat should be simmered in this sauce till nearly done, the vegetables then added, and the cooking completed.

4 pounds of beef or pork
2 pounds liver (boiled)
Small piece of fat meat for seasoning
1 quart sweet corn, cut from cob or canned
1 quart peas, or lima beans
1 quart tomatoes

Now Well Again

Milwaukee, Wisconsin.—"After I had my second child I felt sick and nervous and could not do much. Then after the other baby came I was worse than ever. I suffered this way for a long time and did not know what to do. I was looking over my cook books, and found one of your little books and I sat down and read every page. Then I bought a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and took four bottles of it before I stopped, and now I am well again. I always recommend the Vegetable Compound to my friends." —Mrs. JOHN MITZKE, 773 8th Ave., Milwaukee, Wis.

Buffalo, N. Y.—"My health got worse after my little girl's birth, and my mother advised me to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound as it had done her so much good. I had headaches and tired feelings, with no ambition, also pains at times so it hurt me to walk. With the Vegetable Compound I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Blood Medicine and used Lydia E. Pinkham's Sanative Wash, and I have been greatly helped. I do hope you will use my letter as a testimonial as it will help other women."—Mrs. GEORGE SHOEMAKER, 349 Emslie St., Buffalo, N. Y.

FARM BUREAU GETS CHEAP MONEY OFFER

The Alabama farm bureau cotton marketing association will have all the money it needs this fall and at the lowest interest rate ever offered farmers before, according to a statement in the Montgomery Advertiser.

A group of representatives of New York banks visited the headquarters of the association in Montgomery recently and after looking into the methods employed by the association in marketing cotton offered all the credit needed for the marketing of 200,000 or more bales at 4½ per cent.

A few days later a representative of the Federal Intermediate Credit Bank at New Orleans, visited the cotton association headquarters and offered all the money needed for marketing the 1924 crop at 4½ per cent.

The first year the farm bureau was in operation it had to pay 6 per cent for the money borrowed to market the cotton crop. Before the farm bureau was organized in Alabama farmers paid from 8 to 12 per cent, selling their individual crops.

Suggestions to Farmers

(By A. A. Lauderdale, County Agent, Shelby County)

Hog pasture can be provided the year round and reduce the cost of meat production. Plant oats and hairy vetch as a winter and spring grazing crop.

Hairy Vetch is the leading winter cover crop; it makes a good hay crop with oats, and also a good grazing crop for hogs and cattle. Are you planting vetch this fall?

Permanent pasture lands should be prepared in the summer and fall. Have you decided where you will locate your pasture and begun clearing? Remember that it takes good pasture to put your stock into winter quarters in proper condition, thereby cutting down the winter feed bill.

By milking a few cows along with your present system of farming, you can have a little ready money every day in the year.

Terracing season will soon be here. All possible lands should be terraced before the heavy rains begin to fall. The banks have levels at your disposal.

Mrs. Hardman and Mrs. Flevellen of Birmingham, former residents of Columbiana, spent lasst week with Mrs. Lillie Mae MacKnight.

C. R. Tinney has bought from W. H. Mitchell of Talladega Springs the vacant lot back of the Mitchell building and is placing material on the ground for a garage and filling station.

Night school for Farmers meets tomorrow, Friday, night, at Fourmile. All members are urged to come, and all who are interested in the work are invited. The subject for discussion is: The Care of Milk Cows.

GOOD DEMAND FOR SHELBY COUNTY LAND

There is a prospect of the greatest activity in Shelby county real estate that the county has seen in years, according to U. C. Wheatley of the Calera Realty Company, Calera. Inquiries from several states and from various countess of Alabama are being received regularly, Mr. Wheatley says, and a number of important deals have already been closed within the past few weeks.

Some of the more important transactions reported by the Calera Realty Company are as follows:

Sid Pilgreen place, 2 miles west of Calera on the Montevallo road, 36 acres, brought $755.00.

Geo. F. Baker place, 3 miles from Wilsonville, 53 acres, $2,500.

G. W. Merrell place, four miles from Wilsonville, 107 acres, $1,850.

C. S. Barnes, 3½ miles from Wilsonville, sold 40 acres for $1,150.

F. T. Cost, 2 miles west of Calera, sold 16 acres for $1,100.

R. L. Harper on the Ashville road near Siluria sold 25 acres for $1,400.

S. E. Rogers, South Calera, on new highway, sold 23 acres for $2,500.

A good many men in position to know say that the greatest land values to be had in Alabama right now, are to be found in Shelby county. This is true because of several reasons: the location of Shelby county in the center of Alabama and so near to Birmingham; the quality of the soil and its adaptability to so great a variety of crops and types of farming; and the very reasonable prices at which these lands can be bought.

COTTON FORECAST

The U. S. Department of Agriculture estimates the total yield of cotton this year at 12,787,000 bales, as compared with the estimate of August 16, of 12,956,000 bales. The forecast for Alabama is a yield of 948,000 bales.

8% of the Soft Coal Mined in the United States

Or a total of over a half million cars, was transported during 1923 by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad. With 5,038 miles of track, as compared to a total of 251,175 miles of track in the United States, this figure of 2% of the total trackage, as against 8% of the total amount of coal mined, demonstrates the importance of the L. & N. as a coal-carrying road.

From the mines in Kentucky, Illinois, Tennessee, Virginia and Alabama, this road transports this immense tonnage of "black diamonds"; bringing prosperity to the communities in which the coal is produced, and adding to the comfort and prosperity of the sections in which it is consumed.

Taking things from where they are plentiful to where they are scarce, to the financial and social benefit of both the shipping and receiving communities, is one of the great tasks which the American railroads are capably performing. Don't hamper them by hurtful legislation.

TESTS PLANNED FOR TEACHERS

IN LINE WITH EFFORTS OF THE TEACHERS TO ELEVATE STANDARD IN RURAL SCHOOLS.

Montgomery.—The county elementary school supervisors of Alabama concluded their three-day conference in Montgomery, after deciding on publication of a series of supervisor tests and hearing reports from the committees having these in charge The committees are:

Language test: Miss Cora Pearson, Montgomery, chairman; Miss Pauline O'Rouke, Mobile; Miss B. B. Leach, Luverne, and Miss Grace Forbes, Anniston.

First grade reading test: Miss Sallie Caldwell, Talladega, chairman; Miss Claytie Thornton, Andalusia, and Mrs. Della P. Erwin, Birmingham.

These committees, with some changes in the personnel, have had the tests under consideration and experiment for more than two years in actual school contacts. It was stated at the final session that they will be ready to report within two months for the purpose of publication.

The tests will be sold at actual cost in order that all supervisors may obtain them, according to Miss Cassie R. Spencer, supervisor of elementary education in the state. The publication is in line with the efforts of the teachers and supervisors to elevate the standard of reading and language in the rural schools.

One object stressed was rural health and it was agreed that while this is not within the province of the supervisors, they would lend every assistance to the health authorities of the counties through the schools. Charts and pictures on the walls of the Chamber of Commerce auditorium indicated in what way the school authorities could help.

Personal conferences and group meetings filled the final session.

SIMPLICITY IN NEGLIGEES; SPONSORS VOGUE FOR BLACK

NEGLIGEES, following the lead of other apparel, have reverted to simplicity in design and long unbroken lines. There is something about this simplicity that keeps women of good taste devoted to it. Everything from the gingham house frock to the brilliant evening gown, merely drapes the figure and looks to details of finish or management of materials, or ornamentation (used with considerable restraint) to make it distinctive.

Negligees profit by this vogue and are more beautiful thereby. They are able place in the world of changing fashions.

For coat dresses—and for other dresses just now—black is in great demand. It is a logical and sensible choice for this between-season's period, when summer is passing and women are not inclined to anticipate winter. This black vogue paves the way for colorful clothes when the time comes to wear them.

Besides these very good reasons for deciding on black, when in doubt about color, there is the authority of Paris presented in varied materials, and even those airy and colorful affairs of lace and fabrics that reach the limit of sheerness and suppleness, are quite moderate in price. It is so little work to make them. One such model is pictured here, of thin, plaited crepe de chine with an overgarment of lace. It has long, flowing sleeves, and satin ribbon in three colors, is braided to form the girdle. This model is becoming to everyone providing the right choice in color is made. The furore for black has invaded the realm behind this choice for the demi-season. The Parisienne goes along her way, morning, afternoon and likewise often in the evening, in black attire. Two costumes approved by her are shown.

At the left the dress for street wear, has touches of white, but the dinner or afternoon dress is entirely black and untrimmed. They both merit attention, the coat dress because it presages pipings and ornaments in color later on and the continued use of scarf attachments. The dinner dress is a fine example of adroit of negligees and there are new ones of crepe satin that are to be recommended. They are long and graceful, with surplice fronts fastening with an ornament or rosette. Usually they have elbow sleeves finished with a deep frill of plaited chiffon, in some bright color and the same color is used in most cases for pipings and facings.

For warmth there are negligees of soft satin, in all colors, lined with white Japanese silk. They have an interlining of lamb's wool and are usually made in the long kimono style. Plain and printed velvets are used, in high colors, and embossed, silky materials, that have the appearance of heavy crepe. Meantime handsome Mandarin coats and Japanese kimonos continue to flow hitherward from the Orient and hold their fixed and envidrapery for slenderizing a full figure. It is beautifully simple in appearance. Madam will no doubt exercise her French ingenuity in making it a background to set off a single ornament. She may choose an exquisite piece of jewelry, a small bouquet at the shoulder, or a strand of pearls—to suit occasion.

For between-season's wear, the next choice after black is found in warm shades of dark brown or deep beige, that tone in with fur neck pieces and the fur collars of fall coats. Navy blue is an all-the-year-round color, like black, and is never altogether neglected. It appears among new day-time frocks with pipings and facings of the darker reds, and it is good style to have a narrow leather belt to match.

Will the love that you're so rich in
Build a fire in the kitchen,
And the little god of love turn the spit?

SABBATH-DAY MEALS

The average family expects food a bit nicer and more out of the ordinary on the Sabbath. With the overworked mother this is often an added burden. In many homes the children are taught to be thankful and as Saturday is usually a free day for the school-age child, part of the time may be profitably used in helping about the house. Vegetables may be prepared ready for cooking the day before, dessert made and salads ready for mixing.

When a roast is to be served it is cooked on Saturday and reheated for the Sunday dinner, saving that extra care. Mother needs a rest day as well as any member of the family.

A nice custom in some homes is to allow the father and boys, if any, to prepare the Sunday supper. With ingredients at hand they may make the things they like and it is usually a pleasure they look forward to. Of course they are not as careful at first about dishes and "messing up" the kitchen, but it will not be long before they will learn just how to do things.

What a comfort it is to know that the men and boys in the family are capable of preparing a wholesome meal when the emergency comes. It is worth much to them and to those who need to be served.

Gelatin desserts and those of jello may be prepared the day before, and with whipped cream make a most tasty dessert.

For supper an omelet or milk toast, a rarebit or sandwiches with a hot cup of cocoa may be easily prepared. If cup cakes are prepared the day before one may fill them with whipped cream if a very dainty cake is desired.

Ham Omelet.—Take smoked ham or bacon, cut into small bits and fry in a hot frying pan until well browned. Then add an egg or two for each person with a teaspoonful of cold water to each egg, beating all together until foamy. Pour in the egg and cook until well done on the bottom. Place in a hot oven to finish baking on top. Serve hot at once.

Hot cream soups are another easily prepared dish and one which the most of us enjoy.

WITHIN HOLLERIN' DISTANCE

The Ozark mountain folks of Missouri have their own definitions of success. You must if you would get even "within hollerin' distance," they hold, have a backbone that will teach your wishbone its place. Alice Curtice Moyer-Wing, Ozarkian, and proud of it, ascribes all her victories to having a real Ozark backbone.

Her ultimate goal? It's to sit on the President's cabinet. "All things are possible and every new day brings its opportunities," says Mrs. Wing. "Many persons from my district are urging me to run for congress in 1924. Maybe I'll do it." How come—as the Southerners say—these ultra-conservative Missourians to be suggesting congress to a woman?

It's a long story, at least three generations long. Grandfather gave up prosperity, and finally home for a concentration camp, in order to be an abolitionist in slave territory. Father and mother pioneered in an Ozark homestead. Mr. Curtice had to teach small Alice, for the county seat that is even now in a county without a railroad, offered little education save in primitive living.

A brief stretch of happy married life, and the young mother was widowed. Stenography gave her an opportunity to develop into an expert business correspondent, by "digging in," learning all details of the business. "It would have been the most veritable drudgery—that 15 years of side-tracking from the things I most wished to do," she acknowledges, "had it not been for my children that I was doing it. When the little ones were asleep and I had sewed on all the buttons and darned all the little stockings, I had an article or a story always at hand to work on, for which once in a while I received actual money.

"When my boy and girl grew up, I came to a point where I could choose. I became suffrage editor for newspapers and magazines—for pay. Then illness in my family drove me back to the Ozarks among the people of the hills. My stories of this campaign grew into a six years' series of Ozark character stories. Prior to the 1920 election, I made more than 300 political speeches, again in my hill country. I was one of the first two women in Missouri elected delegate-at-large to a national convention, and one of the first few in the United States.

"Governor Hyde appointed me head of the state industrial inspection department in 1921. It was the first instance in the United States in which a woman was made a member of a governor's cabinet. And I am making good, if I do say it, who shouldn't. My sympathies for people who work for a living came to me as first-hand experience."

ONE LAWYER'S WORK

Good lawyers are such accurate-minded folk that I shall feel safer if I share Florence Monahan's letter with you word for word. Otherwise some phrase would be sure to get to the wrong-twisted meaning, I know.

STATE REFORMATORY FOR WOMEN
Florence Monahan, Superintendent
Shakopee, Minn.

Dear Mrs. Miller:

Born in Chicago, I have always lived in a city until I took charge of this institution four years ago. However, I may say that I like living in the small town very much better than in the city.

I began my work as a schoolteacher as so many women do. While teaching school I studied law and, after receiving my degree, I went into the Minnesota children's bureau to handle illegitimacy cases. This bureau carries out the model children's laws of Minnesota. The bureau is under a state board of control, and when the reformatory for women was opened the board of control thought that, through my experience with all sorts of girls, I could manage this institution.

We have an average population of about sixty women, all over eighteen years of age. Our average age is about thirty years. Women are sentenced here for felonies and gross misdemeanors. We have all the women convicted of any crime which carries with it a sentence of more than a year, including life prisoners. I have eight women on my staff and five men.

You will see that it is rather difficult for me to answer your question in regard to the average girl starting in to work. It seems to me that whether she starts in a big city or a small town does not matter so much as her own ability in whatever work she tries to do.

I am intensely interested in the League of Women Voters and have been on the state board since it was organized, and previous to that time I was on the state board of the old suffrage organization.

Very truly yours,
FLORENCE MONAHAN,
Superintendent.

DENNISON GRANT

SYNOPSIS. — Transley's hay-cutting outfit, after stacking 2,000 tons, is on its way to the big Y.D. ranch headquarters. Transley is a master of men and circumstances. Linder, foreman, is substantial, but not self-assertive. George Drazk, one of the men, is an irresponsible chap who proposes to every woman he meets. Transley and Linder dine with Y.D. and his wife and daughter Zen. Transley resolves to marry Zen. Y.D. instructs Transley to cut the South Y.D., "spite o' h—l an' high water" and a fellow named Landson. Drazk proposes to Zen and is neatly rebuffed. Transley pitches camp on the South Y.D. and finds Landson's outfit cutting hay. Dennison Grant, Landson's manager, notifies Transley that he is working under a lease from the legal owners and warns Transley off. All of which means war. Y.D. and Zen ride to the South Y.D. Zen is a natural vamp, not yet halter-broke and ripe for mating. Y.D. has taken a liking to Transley. Zen holds Transley off and encourages Linder. Zen enjoys the prospect of a race between Transley and Linder for her favor, but secretly laughs at both. She has another and more serious encounter with Drazk. Y.D. mowing machines are ruined by iron stakes set in the grass. Zen prevents open war with Landson. Transley half-way proposes and is turned off. Drazk sets a fire that attacks the Landson stacks. The Y.D. outfit hastens to aid the enemy. Zen rides off alone to help. The wind changes and the Y.D. people now have to fight the prairie fire. Zen rides into the river to escape flames. Drazk tries to abduct her. She drowns him—or thinks she has.

The wind had gone down as the afternoon waned, and the fire was working up the valley leisurely when Zen set out on her return trip. A couple of miles from the Lint homestead she met its advance guard. It was evening now; the sun shone dull red through the banked clouds of smoke resting against the mountains to the west; the flames danced and flickered, advanced and receded, sprang up and died down again, along mile after mile of front. It was a beautiful thing to behold, and Zen drew her horse to a stop on a hill-top to take in the grandeur of the scene. Near at hand frolicking flames were working about the base of the hill, and far down the valley and over the foothills the flanks of the fire stretched like lines of impish infantry in single file.

Suddenly she heard the sound of hoofs, and a rider drew up at her side. She supposed him one of Transley's men, but could not recall having seem him in the camp. He sat his horse with an ease and grace that her eye was quick to appraise; he removed his broad felt hat before he spoke; and he did not call her "ma'am."

"Pardon me—I believe I am speaking to Y.D.'s daughter?" he asked, and before waiting for a reply hastened to introduce himself. "My name is Dennison Grant, foreman on the Landson ranch."

"Oh!" she exclaimed. "I thought—I thought you were one of Mr. Transley's men." Then, with a quick sense of the barrier between them, she added, "I hope you don't think that I—that we—had anything to do with this?" She indicated the ruined valley with her hand.

"No more than I had to do with those coward's stakes," he answered. "Neither of us understand just now, but can we take that much for granted?"

There was something about him that rather appealed to her. "I think we can," she said, simply.

For a moment they watched the kaleidoscopic scene below them. "It may help you to understand," she continued, "if I say that I was riding down to see if I could be of some use to Mrs. Landson when the wind changed, and I saw I would be more likely to be needed here."

"And it may help you to understand," he said, "if I say that as soon as immediate danger to the Landson ranch was over I rode up to Transley's camp. Only the cook was there, and he told me of your having set out to help Mrs. Lint, so I followed up. Fortunately the fire had lost its punch; it will probably go out through the night."

There was a short silence, in which she began to realize her peculiar position. This man was the rival of Transley and Linder in the business of hay-cutting in the valley. He was the foreman of the Landson crowd—Landson, against whom her father had been voicing something very near to murder threats not many hours ago. Had she met him before the fire she would have spurned and despised him, but nothing unites the factions of man like a fight against a common elemental enemy. Besides, there was the question, How did the fire start? That was a question every Landson man would be asking. Grant had been generous about it; he had asked her to be equally generous about the episode of the stakes. . . . And there was something about the man that appealed to her. She had never felt that way about Transley or Linder. She had been interested in them; amused, perhaps; out for an adventure, perhaps; but this man—. Nonsense! It was the environment—the romantic setting. As for Drazk—. A quick sense of horror caught her as the memory of his choking face protruded into her consciousness. . . .

"Well, suppose we ride home," he suggested. "By jove! The fire has worked around us."

It was true. The hill on which they stood was now entirely surrounded by a ring of fire, eating slowly up the side. The warmth of its breath already pressed against their faces; the funnel effect created by the circle of fire was whipping up a stronger draught. The smoke seemed to be gathering to a center above them.

He swung up close to her. "Will your horse face it?" he asked. "If not, we'd better blindfold him."

"I'll try him," she said. "He was all right this afternoon, but he was reckless then with a hard gallop."

Zen's horse trotted forward at her urging to within a dozen yards of the circle of fire. Then he stopped, snorting and shivering. She rode back up the hill.

"Better blindfold him," Grant advised, pulling off his leather coat. "A sleeve of my shirt should be about right. Will you cut it off?"

She protested.

"There's no time to lose," he reminded her, as he placed his knife in her hand. "My horse will go through it all right."

So urged she deftly cut off his sleeve above the elbow and drew it through the bridle of her horse across his eyes.

"Now keep your head down close to his neck. You'll go through all right. Give him the spurs, and good luck!" he shouted.

She was already careering down the hillside. A few paces from the fire the horse plunged into a badger hole and fell headlong. She went over his head, down, with a terrific shock, in the very teeth of the fire.

CHAPTER VI

When Zen came to herself it was with a sense of a strange swimming in her head. Gradually it resolved itself into a sound of water about her head; a splashing, fighting water; two heads in the water; two heads in the water; a lash floating in the water—

"Oh!" She was sure she felt water on her face. . . .

"Where am I?"

"You're all right—you'll be all right in a little while."

"But where am I? What has happened?" She tried to sit up. All was dark. "Where am I?" she demanded.

"Don't be alarmed, Zen—I think your name is Zen," she heard a man's voice saying. "You've been hurt, but you'll be all right presently."

Then the curtain lifted. "You are Dennison Grant," she said. "I remember you now. But what has happened? Why am I here—with you?"

"Well, so far, you've been enjoying about three hours' unconsciousness," he told her. "At a distance which seems about a mile from here—although it may be less—is a little pond. I've carried water in the sleeve of my coat—fortunately it is leather—and poured it somewhat generously upon your brow. And at last I've been rewarded by a conscious word."

She tried to sit up, but desisted when a sudden twitch of pain held her fast.

"Let me help you," he said, gently. "We have camped, as you may notice, on a big, flat rock. I found it not far from the scene of the accident, so I carried you over to it. It is drier than the earth, and, for the forepart of the night at least, will be warmer." With a strong arm about her shoulders he drew her into a sitting posture.

Her eyes were becoming accustomed to the darkness. "What's wrong with my foot?" she demanded. "My boot's off."

"I'm afraid you turned your ankle getting free from your stirrup," he explained. "I had to do a little surgery. I could find nothing broken. It will be painful, but I fear there is nothing to do but bear it."

She reached down and felt her foot. It was neatly bandaged with cloth very much like that which she had used to blindfold Quiver. It was easy to surmise where it came from. Evidently her protector had stopped at nothing.

"Well, are we to stay here permanently," she asked, presently.

"Only for the night," he told her. "If we're lucky, not that long. Search parties will be hunting for you, and they will doubtless ride this way. Both of our horses bolted in the fire—"

"Oh, yes, the fire! Tell me what happened."

He hesitated.

"I remember riding into the fire," she continued, "and then next thing I was on this rock. How did it all happen?"

"Your horse fell," he explained, "just as you reached the fire, and threw you, pretty heavily, to the ground. I was behind, so I dismounted and dragged you through."

"Oh!" She felt her face. "But I am not even singed!" she exclaimed.

It was plain that he was holding something back. She turned and laid her fingers on his arm. "Tell me how you did it," she pressed.

The darkness hid his modest confusion. "It was really nothing," he stammered. "You see, I had a leather coat, and I just threw it over your head—and mine—and dragged you out."

She was silent for a moment while the meaning of his words came home to her. Then she placed her hand frankly in his.

"Thank you," she said, and even in the darkness she knew that their eyes had met.

"You are very resourceful," she continued presently. "Must we sit here all night?"

"I can think of no alternative," he confessed. "If we had firearms we could shoot a signal, or if there were grass about we could start a fire, although it probably would not be noticed with so many glows on the horizon tonight." He stopped to look about. Dull splashes of red in the sky pointed out remnants of the day's conflagration still eating their way through the foothills. The air was full of the pungent but not unpleasant smell of burnt grass.

"A pretty hard night to send a signal," he said, "but they're almost sure to ride this way."

She wondered why he did not offer to walk to the camp for help; it could not be more than four or five miles. Suddenly she thought she understood.

"I am not afraid to stay here alone," she said, with a little laugh. It was the first time Grant had heard her laugh, and he thought it very musical indeed. "I've slept out many a night, and you would be back within a couple of hours."

"I'm quite sure you're not afraid," he agreed, "but, you see, I am. You got quite a tap on the head, and for some time before you came to you were talking—rather foolishly. Now if I should leave you it is not only possible, but quite probable, that you would lapse again into unconsciousness. . . . I really think you'll have to put up with me here."

"Oh, I wasn't thinking of that! . . . Did I—did I talk—foolishly?"

"Rather. Seemed to think you were swimming—or fighting—I couldn't be sure which. Sometimes you seemed to be doing both."

"Oh!" With a cold chill the events of the day came back upon her. That struggle in the water; it came to her now like a bad dream out of the long, long past. How much had she said?

How much would she have given to know what she had said! She felt herself recounting events. . . .

Presently she pulled herself up with a start. She must not let him think her moody.

"Well, if we must enjoy each other's company, we may as well do so companionably," she said, with an effort at gaiety. "Let us talk. Tell me about yourself."

"First things first," he parried.

"Oh, I've nothing to tell. My life has been very unromantic. A few years at school, and the rest of it on the range. A very every-day kind of existence."

"I think it's the 'every-day kind of existence' that is romantic," he returned. "It is a great mistake to think of romance as belonging to other times and other places. Even the most commonplace person has experienced romance enough for a dozen books. Quite possibly he has not recognized the romance, but it was there. The trouble is that with our limited sense of humor, what we think of as romance in other people's lives becomes tragedy in our own."

How much did he know? . . . "Yes," she said, "I suppose that is so."

"I know it is so," he went on. "If we could read the thoughts—know the experiences—of those nearest to us, we would never need to look out of our own circles for either romance or tragedy. But it is as well that we can't. Take the experience of today, for example. I admit it has not been a commonplace day, and yet it has not been altogether extraordinary. Think of the experiences we have been through just this day, and how, if they were presented in fiction, they would be romantic, almost unbelievable. And here we are at the close, sitting on a rock, matter-of-fact people in a matter-of-fact world, accepting everything as commonplace and unexceptional."

"Not quite that," she said daringly. "I see that you are neither commonplace nor unexceptional." She spoke with sudden impulse out of the depth of her sincerity. She had not met a man like this before. In her mind she fixed him in contrast with Transley, the self-confident and aggressive, and Linder, the shy and unassertive. None of those adjectives seemed to fit this new acquaintance. Nevertheless, he suffered nothing by the contrast.

"If I had been bright enough I would have said that first," he apologized, "but I got rather carried away in one of my pet theories about romance. Now my life, I suppose, to many people would seem quite tame and unromantic, but to me it has been a delightful succession of somewhat placid adventures. It began in a very orthodox way, in a very orthodox family. My father, under the guidance, no doubt, of whatever star governs such lucky affairs, became possessed of a comfortable fortune, and I was brought up to fit my station in life, whatever that means. There were just two boys of us, and I was the elder. My father had become a broker. He wanted me to go into the office with him, but some way I didn't fit in. I've no doubt there was lots of romance there, too, but I was of the wrong nature; I simply couldn't get enthusiastic over it. Being of a frank disposition I confided in my father that I felt I was wasting my time in a broker's office. He, being of an equally frank disposition, confided in me that he entertained the same opinion.

"I could see that my father was pained and disappointed, even in his anger. 'You have upset all my plans, you have destroyed all my hopes,' he charged me. His voice was hard, but I think that was to keep it from breaking. 'What's the use of making money if you haven't a son to carry on? Roy'—that is my younger brother—'is too young as yet, and, I think, a trifle reckless for responsibility. I was counting on you to take up the load when I laid it down. Besides,' he went on, 'I had other plans for your future.' The dear old fellow had been giving more thought to it than I had suspected. 'Within a few years you should marry. Now there's Emily Forcep'—that wasn't her name, but it will do for purposes of conversation—'good family, and well off. Colonel Forcep and I are agreed that it would be just the thing. Capital match for you, my boy—'

"'But,' I protested, 'I don't love Miss Forcep. Why, I hardly know her!'

"'That will come in time,' said he. 'You're at the romantic age just now, but later you'll understand it isn't hard to love a girl who is well brought up and has a million in her own right—'

"At that I flared up. 'Nothing doing,' I said, very disrespectfully, I am afraid. 'If your business, and your money, and Miss Forcep, and her money, not to speak of Colonel Forcep, have to be counted as a going concern, you can keep the lot. My life is my own and I'm going to live it in my own way.'"

Grant paused, and the girl found her fingers resting on his knee. . . . It was very delightful to have the curtain lifted on this strong man's career.

"Go on," she whispered.

"I've been sorry for it since—not for what I did; I've never been sorry for that—but for what I said. You see, my life wasn't my own; it was his, who gave it to me; his, and my dead mother's. But young fellows don't think of that—not, at least, until it is too late.

Naturally Zen becomes interested in Grant. Will he cut out Transley and Linder?

JESUS DRIVEN FROM NAZARETH

LESSON TEXT—Luke 4:16-30.

GOLDEN TEXT—"He hath anointed me to preach the gospel."—Luke 4:18.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Visits His Home Town.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Faces a Mob.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Jesus Explains His Message.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Mission of Christianity.

I. Jesus in the Synagogue (v. 16).

On the Sabbath day He went into the synagogue according to His custom. He no doubt went that day with a new and definite purpose, but it is refreshing to know that it was according to His habit.

II. Jesus Reading the Scriptures (vv. 17-19).

1. The Book Handed to Him (v. 17). It was not only His custom to attend the place of worship but to take a part in it. This privilege was not confined to the rabbis (Acts 13:15).

2. The Passage Read (Isaiah 61:1, 2). Most likely this passage was chosen by Him with a specific purpose.

3. The Content of the Passage (vv. 18, 19).

(1) The mission of the Messiah (v. 18). It was:

(a) To preach the gospel to the poor. The good tidings which Jesus proclaimed are peculiarly welcome to the common people.

(b) To heal the broken-hearted. The gospel of Christ peculiarly meets the needs of those whose hearts are crushed by the weight of their own sins or by the burden of sorrow and disappointment.

(c) To preach deliverance to the captives. The gospel of Christ does actually set man free from the slavery of sin (John 8:36).

(d) Recovering of sight to the blind. Christ did actually make those who were physically blind to see (John 9:6, 7) and also opened the eyes of those who were spiritually blind (I John 5:20).

(e) To set at liberty them that are bruised. The power of Christ can free the most utterly hopeless ones.

(f) To preach the acceptable year of the Lord. The primary allusion is the year of Jubilee (Lev. 25:8-10) in which all those in bondage were released.

(2) The special endowment of the Messiah (v. 18). The reason why the Spirit was upon Him was that He might fulfill specifically His Messianic work. It was not for the display of power. The enduement of the Holy Spirit is not for mere power's sake.

III. Jesus Expounding the Scriptures (vv. 20, 21).

1. He Closed the Book and Sat Down. It seems to have been the custom of the Jewish teachers to sit while teaching.

2. "This Day Is This Scripture Fulfilled." This statement is no doubt but a gist of what He said.

IV. Jesus' Reception by the People (vv. 22-30).

Their reception was characterized by—

1. Ignorant Prejudice (v. 22). "Is not this Joseph's son?" As if to say, "This is our fellow townsman with whom we have been acquainted for years. Surely, therefore, He cannot be the Messiah."

2. Unbelief as to His Supernatural Character (v. 23). They challenged Him to exhibit examples of divine power as He had done in other places.

3. Personal Jealousy (v. 24). Jealousy prevents us from seeing the essential worth of the men in our midst. Foreigners are more appreciative. A prophet is not accepted at home, primarily because he is a prophet. Prophets were sent in times of moral and spiritual declination and their messages were stern rebukes of sin. He adduces two outstanding examples of the willingness of foreigners to believe God.

(1) Elijah was sent to a widow at Sarepta (vv. 25, 26). Many widows of Israel were passed by due, doubtless, to the fact that they would not have received the prophet.

(2) Naaman, the foreigner, of many lepers was the only one cleansed.

4. Violent Hatred (vv. 28-30). This comparison of the Jews to foreigners so stunned their pride that they madly drove Him out of their city, even tried to kill Him. He showed them that just as Elijah had brought blessing to one who lived in Sidon and Elisha to one in Syria, while the people of Israel went on suffering, even so the Gentiles would receive the blessings of His saving power while they, the chosen nation, would suffer in unbelief.

Religion

Religion, in one sense, is a life of self-denial; but self-denial does not belong to religion as characteristic of it, it belongs to human life. The lower nature must always be denied when we are trying to rise to a higher sphere.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Poor Man's Pride

So many men to whom the East side missionary had given money had expressed a preference for a certain lodging house that he wondered what constituted its particular attraction.

"It makes us feel self-respecting," said the men, when questioned.

So far as the mission worker could see, it was the typical cheap lodging house, whose inducements to self-respect were not discernible to the ordinary eye. So he interviewed the manager.

Find Profit in Dairying—

Farmers of Shelby county should read with interest the experience of a group of farmers in Choctaw county as given by the county agent of that county: Two years ago a few farmers in one community decided to try shipping their surplus cream. Now 19 farmers are regular shippers. There is no railroad near so they haul their cream to Meridian, 23 miles away. The returns run from $15.00 to $75.00 a month for each shipper. All the feed is raised at home. The county agent adds that none of his farmers depend on dairying alone; they simply use it as a side line that brings in ready money all through the year.

Wheat in Dairy Rations Is Highly Recommended

Recent low farm prices of wheat and the relatively higher price of bran and other grains and by-product feeds have produced an interest in the feeding value of wheat for live stock. As wheat is usually too valuable to feed to dairy cattle unless unfit for milling purposes, few dairymen have had experience in feeding it.

Ground wheat, while not as palatable as other cereal grains, due to the fact that it forms a sticky mass in the mouth, still is an excellent feed. The grain can be crushed instead of ground and, when fed in a grain mixture with bulky feeds, this objection is largely overcome.

Wheat contains practically the same amount of digestible carbohydrates, but considerably less fat than corn. Wheat is slightly richer in digestible protein, but is slightly lower in total digestible nutrients.

As compared to wheat bran, whole wheat contains less protein, but almost 25 per cent more total digestible nutrients. While bran is light and bulky, whole wheat has the opposite characteristic. Therefore, bran does not replace wheat as well as does corn.

Cows Will Produce More if Fed Much Roughage

"Better Feeding for Dairy Cows" is the title of a new bulletin by Purdue university. The bulletin says in part:

Dairy cows will be better fed and will produce much more profitably if:

1. They are fed all the roughage they will eat.

2. Most of their dry roughage is made up of such legumes as alfalfa, clover, soy bean or cowpea hay.

3. They are fed silage during the winter.

4. Their grain ration contains enough protein supplement to give it balance.

5. Cows are not expected to obtain too much of their feed from pasture, but are fed when pastures become poor in the summer and are taken off of pasture when it becomes poor in the fall.

Cows Crave for Wood

A craving for wood does not necessarily mean that a cow is in need of a tonic or medicine. Cows will sometimes develop a habit of chewing on foreign substances like that and they are very hard to break. The habit is started sometimes by the lack of salt which causes the cow to chew on something that has a salty taste. Provide plenty of salt with a balanced ration and plenty of good drinking water and it may be that the cow will forget her habit.

TONSILITIS

THE tonsils are little glands, normally about the size of small hickory nuts. They lie in the mucous membrane in the back of the mouth, just above the base of the tongue. They have little canals, called crypts, which secrete mucus to moisten the lining membrane of the mouth.

When the tonsils are healthy, we never know they are there. But if they become inflamed and swollen, they produce a severe and painful condition called tonsilitis.

This is one of the causes of what is popularly called "sore throat." The child may have a chill, followed by fever, a sore throat, pain and difficulty in swallowing. In mild, simple cases, the inflammation disappears in a few days. But it is liable to return, especially in weak, undernourished children.

If pus germs get into the little crypts, they produce deep inflammation which may result in an abscess. This is called "quinzy." When this happens, the tonsils become greatly enlarged, sometimes filling up the throat so that breathing is difficult. After a few days of intense pain and discomfort, this abscess may "break," relieving the pain. The doctor, by lancing the abscess, shortens the disease and so prevents many hours of suffering.

Instead of forming an abscess, the infection may become chronic and the tonsils may then become permanently enlarged and interfere with breathing.

The constant absorption of poison from the infected and inflamed tonsils may cause "rheumatism," pain in the joints or muscles, fever or loss of appetite. The child is thin, pale, poorly nourished and subject to frequent and continued "colds." The poison may reach the heart, causing some form of heart disease, or may affect the kidneys.

Long continued inflammation of the tonsils, either in the acute form or in the milder but chronic form, destroys the structure of the tonsils and converts the glands into masses of scar tissue. They are then not only of no use, but they are a real danger. The best thing to do is to get rid of them. Their removal is a simple matter of little danger or discomfort to the patient, if done by a competent physician.

PNEUMONIA DEATH RATE CUT DOWN

PNEUMONIA is one of the commonest and most fatal diseases. It is also the most important disease in the so-called "Respiratory Group" which, so far, modern science has been unable to prevent.

While pneumonia is more prevalent in the early spring and late fall, it occurs practically all the year round, in rural districts, in small towns, and large cities. It is particularly prevalent in old age; in fact, some medical authorities say that pneumonia is the natural termination of the life of the old person.

Those diseases caused by polluted water, such as cholera, typhoid fever and dysentery, and those carried by insects, such as yellow fever, typhus fever and malaria, have been very largely controlled. But the respiratory group, including pneumonia, bronchitis, influenza, and probably some forms of meningitis, is, so far as our present knowledge and methods go, beyond control.

If a disease cannot be prevented, the next best thing is to cure it as quickly and completely as possible. But here again difficulties arise.

Many different forms of serums and vaccines for the treatment of pneumonia have been proposed in the last twenty years. None of them has given satisfactory results. The New York City Health department, however, has announced the perfection of a new substance for the treatment of pneumonia which, it is hoped, will cut the death rate from 25 to 50 per cent.

This substance was discovered by Dr. Lloyd D. Felton of the department of preventive medicine of Harvard Medical school. It is a white, crystalline powder which Doctor Felton extracted from ordinary horse serum which has been used quite widely in the past in the treatment of influenza. It has been used in the treatment of 120 pneumonia patients without the slightest unfavorable effect. It is apparently free from the substances in other serums which sometimes cause chills, fever and other bodily manifestations.

The discovery of this substance is the result of five years of research and experimental work, inaugurated by Doctor Felton with the support of the Metropolitan Life Insurance company after the widespread influenza epidemic of 1918.

It is, of course, too early to make any definite statements regarding the value of this discovery, but the conditions under which the substance has been produced, the long period devoted to experimental work, and the results secured by the Boston and New York City Health departments all lead to the hope that it may prove an effective addition to present methods of treating pneumonia and to the reduction of the high mortality rate which has always prevailed in this disease.

What's Wrong Here?

The Saturday Evening Post says: "It was that hour of a rather sultry early summer afternoon when the merchants along the west side of Main street in a certain western town are wont to emerge from their stores, one after another, and lower their awnings against the glare of the afternoon sun."

The west side of the street would be in the shade in the afternoon and it would be the east side where the merchants would be lowering their awnings to keep out the glare—unless the Saturday Evening Post had in mind some novel sort of sun which sets in the east.—The Pathfinder.

AFTER BABY WAS BORN

Back Weak and Painful. Mrs. Miller Benefited by Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Rotan, Texas.—"I am writing to let you know how I have been benefited by taking your medicine. After my second baby was born my back was weak and hurt me continually, so I thought I'd try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound as I had read so much about where it had helped so many women. I had been bothered with my back for over a year, and it would hurt me until I could not do my work, which is keeping house for three and cooking and washing dishes. I tell all my friends if they have any kind of female troubles to give Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial. You may use this testimonial if it will help any one."—Mrs. C. R. MILLER, R. F. D. No. 1, Box 76, Rotan, Texas.

In a recent country-wide canvass of purchasers of Lydia E Pinkham's Vegetable Compound over 121,000 replies were received, and 98 out of every 100 reported they were benefited by its use. For sale by druggists everywhere.

Account Was There, But Not Much Else

President Ernest Frothingham, of the Commercial Trust company, said at a bankers' banquet in Denver:

"We bankers are often called heartless. You remember the story of the dead shot who, having failed to kill his man at point blank range explained that he shot four times at the fellow's heart, not knowing he was a banker.

"Bankers, as a matter of fact, are altogether too kindly and indulgent. A young clubman went to a tailor the other day and ordered a dozen suits of clothes on credit. The tailor asked for a reference.

"'Oh,' said the young clubman, 'go over to the Third National bank people. They know all about me. I have an account there.'

"So the tailor went over to the bank and said to the cashier:

"'I understand that young Mr Cromwell keeps his account here.'

"'He does,' said the cashier, 'but goodness knows where he keeps his money.'"—Detroit Free Press.

MR. DRAKE'S FAMILY

OLD Mr. Drake was thinking very hard, for in his family he had one Madam Duck that had only one duckling. "She gives more time to that one than the others give to their whole brood," said Mr. Drake. "Now, something must be done or she will never lay any more eggs."

"Dicky Duck is such a delicate child," explained Madam Duck when old Mr. Drake told her to let Dicky find his own worms and food. "He has to be looked after very carefully, Mr. Drake. I am sure you can see he is not at all like other ducks—quite different."

"Yes, he is," said Mr. Drake to himself as he walked away, "and if I do not take matters in hand he will never be like other ducks. And that would be a pity, for I think Dicky should make a fine drake some day to take my place."

"Your Son Is One to Be Proud of, Madam Duck."

And then Mr. Drake did some wise thinking, and the next morning he told all of the ducklings that the one who found the biggest worm should lead in the swimming on the pond and, besides, he should have a dish of mush all for himself.

"Of course Dicky Duck cannot be in the contest," said Madam Duck. "He is not strong enough to do hard work."

"You see if I am not," said Dicky, and off he waddled with the other ducklings before his mother could stop him.

It was Dicky Duck who won the prize and his mother was so proud that she bragged about it all around the yard. But the next morning she was so worried for fear he had overworked that she made him sit in a nice mud puddle while she hunted for his food.

"What are you doing there?" called out old Mr. Drake when he saw Dicky sitting all comfortable. "Why are you not hunting for worms?"

"I worked so hard yesterday that I am tired," said Dicky Duck.

From under his wing old Mr. Drake took a switch he had cut and said: "If you do not wish to know how this feels across your back and around your legs you begin to waddle, and waddle fast. The next time I see you taking any food that your mother has found I shall let you find out just how a nice willowy switch feels as well as looks."

Dicky waddled away, and when his mother returned with a fat worm for her only child wise Mr. Drake said: "You son is one to be proud of, Madam Duck, and he wishes me to tell you he can earn his own living now, and you are not to bother again getting worms or bugs for him.

"He is ashamed of sitting around while you work, for the other ducklings think he just happened to find the biggest worm yesterday, and it was luck, not because he was so smart. And now he wants to show them they are mistaken.

"An I will tell you something, madam; the farmer has looked in your nest several times lately, and if you wish to live to see how smart your son really is, my advice to you is to attend to egg-laying and let Dicky show how clever he is."

Madam Duck swallowed the worm she had for her son and looked after Mr. Drake with wide-open eyes. But she waddled off to the duck house and found her nest, for she knew Mr. Drake was a wise old bird and there was truth in what he said.

"I managed that rather cleverly, I think," said Mr. Drake as he waddled toward the pond. "I shall have no more trouble with either of them, I feel sure."

FEELS IT HIS DUTY TO TELL THE FACTS

"Tanlac has meant so much to me in the way of improved health that I feel it a duty, as well as a pleasure, to recommend it," is the appreciative statement of J. M. Freeman, well-known resident of 307 Camden St., San Antonio, Texas.

"About a year ago my stomach and digestion got all out of fix and I soon became badly run-down. My appetite went back on me and the little I did eat failed to nourish me. Constipation troubled me nearly all the time and I also had bilious spells and attacks of dizziness.

"My sleep was unsound and I got up mornings with a mean, sickening taste in my mouth and a dull headache that lasted me almost through the day. I lost considerable weight and that tired, draggy feeling was on me all the time.

"After a few days' use of Tanlac I noticed a marked improvement in my appetite, digestion and general condition. So I took four bottles and by that time I was eating as heartily as I ever did and digesting everything fine.

"My liver went to work right, my headaches stopped and I was able to sleep like a log. I had gone down to only 143 pounds, but I am now a strong man of 215 pounds, and my health is the best it has been in years. A friend of mine took four bottles of Tanlac at the same time I did and got fine results, too. As a builder of health and strength Tanlac is certainly without an equal."

Tanlac is for sale by all good druggists. Accept no substitute. Over 40 Million bottles sold.

Difficult to Please

A Lancashire man was taken by his friend, who owned horses, to the races for the first time.

The friend had a "certainty" running in the first race, and encouraged his companion to back it. He did so, and after an exciting finish the horse won by a short head.

The owner did not meet his friend again until the starters were out for the last race, when he whispered confidentially that he had a good tip.

"Nowt doing," came the quick reply. "T'other only just won."—London Tit-Bits.

Proves Vanity Box Not Modern Device

What is believed by experts to have been a kind of vanity box used by the women of 2,000 years ago, and a necklace of solid gold, were unearthed recently on a Norwegian farm by a peasant who gave the articles to his children for playthings.

Collectors eventually heard of the discovery and induced the children to part with their ancient toys. The articles, in the judgment of the experts, date back to about 120 B. C. The ring, of artistic though barbaric design, has been placed in the museum of Christiania university, while the vanity box has been going the rounds among experts who are eager to determine if it contained a powder puff among its appurtenances, or, if not, what might have been in use to take its place in those days.

Facts about your name; its history; meaning; whence it was derived; significance; your lucky day, lucky jewel

GWENDOLEN

GWENDOLEN, which has long been the victim of satire and the supposed product of affectation in this country, has really the noble and most dignified of origins. It is one of the appellatives of the round table, and is indissolubly associated with all that is finest in romantic history. The name comes from the Welsh, and means "fair-browed." All the Gwendolens of history have been radiantly beautiful.

The first famous Gwendolen, according to the "Brut and Geoffery" of Monmouth, was the daughter of Corineus, duke of Cornwall, and wife of Locrine, son of the original Brutus. He deserted her for the sake of a fair German captive and she made war upon him, in the course of which he was killed, and Estrild and her daughter, Sabrina or Avern, made prisoners; whereupon the vengeful queen caused both to be drowned in the river which was afterward known as the Severn.

There is a Welsh saint named St. Gwendolen, who was the famous "Gwen," mother of Caradog Vreichfras, the excellent Sir Cradocke of King Arthur's round table. There was also Gwendolen, the beauty of Arthur's court, and it was she who is said to have possessed the golden chess board upon which silver men played of their own accord. In Wales the daughter of the last native prince was so called, and for that reason, her name will always continue in popularity there.

Onyx is Gwendolen's talismanic stone. It is said to protect her from evil and disease, and to cool anger if worn about the neck. Thursday is her lucky day and 5 her lucky number.

Have You This Habit?

By Margaret Morison

SCHOOLING

THE governor of the state was looking for a school to which to send his daughter. The capital amused itself with speculations. Certain ladies withheld registration of their children until the matter should be decided and results published, and certain others registered in both of the city's leading educational institutions. Mrs. Browne and Mrs. Gray were discussing the subject over their tea one afternoon. Oulde Hall, asserted Mrs. Gray, must be the great man's choice. Mrs. Gray's own daughter went to Oulde Hall. At Oulde Hall was a sense of tradition; the school turned out ladies; their graduates knew how to enter, and, a far more difficult matter, how to leave a room; at Oulde Hall one somehow learned to carry on an entertaining conversation.

Mrs. Browne bridled. Mary Browne went to the Capital academy. Here they turned out scholars. Their alumnae were honor students in college, and most of them went to college! Moreover, they were conspicuous afterward in the world.

Meanwhile, the governor was paying a business call on an old friend, who had that year started a new school of which Mrs. Gray and Mrs. Browne had never even heard.

"You know," the head was saying, "it would be sheer dishonesty to blind ourselves to the fact that your daughter will have great social responsibilities to meet. It's clear that you are presidential timber, Frank. Children learn most from one another, and from my children she won't learn the give and take of world-wide society. That's really important for meeting life, and it's the part of old friendship to let you know our weak points."

"Yes, I've already talked with Mrs. Gray," smiled the governor.

"And our efficiency in passing examinations will hardly come up to the standards of Capital academy," went on the governor's friend.

"I've also seen Mrs. Browne," interrupted the governor.

"Mrs. Gray and Mrs. Browne would call my educational ideas old-fashioned," she ended.

"Praise be for that," said the governor. Then he himself took the floor. "Here is another old-fashioned idea: Your school, I believe, will not spend its days in doing details only; you will put fundamental facts above form; you will, if I know whereof I speak, encourage imagination and independence—the qualities back of the habit of aiming at big things."

The Why of Superstitions

By H. IRVING KING

BITING INTO SNAKES

INVESTIGATIONS of the American Folklore society show that there is a superstition general throughout the United States that biting into a living snake will insure sound teeth for the one who does the biting. The black snake is generally indicated but in some sections they prefer a rattlesnake. The same superstition prevails in Canada. The pedigree of this superstition is easily traced. It is a survival, almost unaltered from its original form, from the remotest ages. In the folklore, religions, myths, mythologies—what you will—of the ancients the serpent appears prominently. With regard to the superstition under consideration we have to do only with one of the many attributes assigned the snake by men of olden times. He was particularly calculated to transfer his own characteristics to man by the magic of contact. Therefore those who ate a snake acquired many of the snake's accomplishments.

Democritus, writing about 2,300 years ago, mentions the fact that one who ate of a snake could understand the language of birds and Saxo Grammaticus, the Dane, writing as late as the Thirteenth century, mentions the ability to understand the language of animals as one of the many powers obtained by human beings by eating snakes.

This belief lingers today in parts of Germany and Bohemia and down to the Nineteenth century it was a common belief in Scandinavia that wisdom was obtained by eating snakes.

In short from the Red sea to the Arctic the belief in the efficacy of snake eating prevailed in remote antiquity and lingers today in the form of popular superstitions, some of which have found their way to these shores.

Now snakes have remarkably good and effective teeth, and if they are broken off, or fall out, they renew themselves. So, naturally, if you chew a snake along his back—the process recommended by the superstition in question—you obtain, by that branch of sympathetic magic known as the magic of contact, firm and lasting teeth yourself.

RADIO FANS HEAR ARMY OFFICERS TALK ACROSS CONTINENT

A wonderful demonstration of the use of the radio as a means of communication was given by the War Department of the United States government on Friday night of last week. As a fitting close to the first national Defense Test Lay it was arranged that Secretary of War, John W. Weeks, and General John J. Pershing should broadcast addresses on Defense Day. A number of the most powerful broadcasting stations were joined together so that the addresses by the war secretary and General Pershing were broadcasted to all parts of the country and were heard by millions of people who were seated in their own homes, listening in.

The most remarkable feature of the evenings's program was carried out in co-operation with the Bell Telephone Company. About 9 o'clock General Pershing called by long distance telephone, General Bullard in New York, General Hale in Chicago; General Duncan in Omaha and General Martin in San Francisco and had each of these officers to give him a report of the manner in which Defense Day was observed in his respective area. This part of the program consumed something like 20 minutes and every word spoken by General Pershing in Washington and by the officers from New York to San Francisco, was heard distinctly over radio in Columbiana.

General Pershing, who was to pass the next day to the retired list because of his age, took the opportunity to bid each one of the commanding officers an official good bye. They in turn wished General Fershing God speed and paid high tribute to him for his great service as commander of the armies of the nation.

There is nothing more wonderful in all the history of American invention than the marvelous development of radio Those in position to know are already predicting that in a short time it will be possible for the people in America to sit around their own firesides and hear addresses and programs as they are being given in London and Paris.

WILLIAM A. PARKER DIED LAST SATURDAY

Columbiana and Shelby county lost a good citizen in the passing of W. A. Parker, who died Saturday morning in a Birmingham infirmary following an operation which he had Thursday before. Mr. Parker had not been well for some time but he kept faithfully at his work as mail carrier for Route Two, Columbiana, making his last round on Saturday, September 6th. On Monday following he was not well enough to go and on Tuesday he went to Birmingham for an examination.

The operation was a serious one but on Friday he was reported to be doing better than the doctors expected. Friday night his condition became worse and death came to him early Saturday morning.

The remains were brought to his home in Columbiana Saturday night and the funeral service, conducted by Rev .R. W. Stuckey, assisted by Rev. John Milner, was held there at 1:30 Sunday afternoon. Following the service a large number of friends accompanied the family to the Wallace burying ground above Wilsonville, where under a profusion of flowers the body was tenderly laid to rest.

Mr. Parker was 55 years old and since he was but a small boy had made his home in Columbiana. For fifteen years he had served the people of Route 2, Columbiana as their mail carrier and he was faithful in the performance of his duty. Day after day and year after year, in all sorts of weather, he made his rounds, traveling in the aggregate many thousands of miles, and as he put it, "making several trips around the world." He was friendly and accommodating and in return he had the friendship of many people. The little boys and girls of his neighborhood and on his mail route felt they had a good friend in Mr. Parker.

Farmers Night School Makes Good Start

The farmers night school at Fourmile, that proved so successful last season, promises even greater results this year, according to Mr. Montgomery, who is conducting the school.

The subject for the series of lessons to be given is Dairying, and every member of the school who is not already engaged in some form of dairying is expected to get some cows and sell dairy products, either whole milk or cream, as his project for the year. The meetings that have been held have been well attended and there is a good interest in the subjects that are being discussed.

The members of the class who have enrolled with the agreement to carry out all requirements of the course are as follows: J. A. Cates, L. P. Mooney, T. J. Stone, G. R. Stone, Frank McEwen, J. T. McEwen, Mr. Barclay, G. P. Archer, M. L. Powell, C. C. Cross, and J.W. Armstrong. It is Mr. Montgomery's plan to establish the work of dairying in the Fourmile community on a permanent basis. He is making all his plans with the greatest care and he hopes to see the movement grow until other communities will follow the lead of Fourmile so that Shelby county may take her place as one of the leading dairy counties in Alabama.

The next meeting of the school will be held Friday, (tomorrow) night at the Fourmile school house at 7:30 o'clock. Luther Fowler, editor of the Shelby County Reporter, will be one of the speakers at this meeting.

THE COMMISSION SEEKS MORE FUNDS

MEETING FOR THIS PURPOSE IS PROPOSED FOR NOVEMBER 7 AT STATE FAIR, IN MONTGOMERY.

Montgomery—It is the purpose of the state highway commission, on Nov. 7, during the state fair in Montgomery, to hold a conference with county road officials on how to raise further funds to carry on the program of building roads in Alabama.

The announcement was made by Chairman John A. Rogers in a statement bearing upon figures tabulated at the state highway department, showing the counties that have not yet received all of their $300,000 allotment of highway bond funds, and the amounts due these counties. It is the intention of the commission, Chairman Rogers said, to see that the statute guaranteeing each county a minimum of $300,000 from the proceeds of state highway bonds, is carried out in both spirit and letter.

Mr. Rogers stated also that in distributing the funds hereafter, before those counties that already have received their quota are given more roads, those counties that so far have not received their quota will be taken care of. "The commission realizes this will be a disappointment to many of the counties of the state," said Chairman Rogers, "but the commission feels that this course will meet with the approval of all fair-minded people in the state."

In order to give each county the minimum amount guaranteed to it of $300,000, Mr. Rogers pointed out, would require $20,100,000. Only $25,000,000 of state highway bonds were authorized. "It is evident," he stated at this point, "that before Alabama can have an adequate system of roads, the state must apply in some way, more funds to build these roads." Then the chairman of the highway commission told of the proposed conference with county road officials in Montgomery, on the question of raising further funds for highway construction. Regarding such a conference, he said the advice and suggestions of all citizens interested in the building of roads, whether they are officials or not, will be welcomed.

"It is believed," continued Senator Rogers, "when it is seen that the commission is distributing the road fund fairly all over the state, that it will be no trouble to get the people to help obtain the money which will be needed in road work. North Carolina has about the same number of square miles as Alabama. North Carolina, in conjunction with its counties has already spent $115,000,000 on its roads and will spend as much more in the next five or 10 years. Alabama has more potential wealth than even the great state of North Carolina. Its people are in every sense as progressive as citizens of North Carolina. Their attitude toward road building is becoming more enthusiastic every day, both for more and better miles of public roads."

In the opinion of the chairman of the state highway commission that the money necessary to build Alabama a system of roads that will meet the demands of traffic and travel, can be raised without levying additional tax on real or personal property. In his opinion this money can be obtained through the issue of long-time road bonds, and the interest on these bonds and a sinking fund to retire them at maturity, would come from a moderate tax on gasoline. "In this way," he said, "those who use the roads and those in business who are the beneficiaries of the trade which comes exclusively through the use of vehicles on the roads will pay for the roads."

GOWNS ADROITLY FLATTER; COATS FOR COLLEGE GIRLS

"WHY experiment?" say many of the great style creators. So long as women are devoted to the straight-line silhouette these designers will take it as a matter of course and concentrate all their energies on affairs of decoration and variation in details. Thus they turn out numberless beautiful afternoon and evening gowns uniform as to style, but so varied in construction that there are almost no two alike.

Unusual and Beautiful Evening Dress.

All that remains for femininity is to "pick and choose" just the one particular pattern that is most kind—as in a hat, becomingness is the first thing to be considered. She who is short and stout will borrow long lines and slenderness from her gowns and she of the bean-pole figure will choose a gown that drapes it into graciousness. In the evening dress pictured a chemiselike, straight-line gown contrives to be unusual as well as beautiful. Imagine it in a dark color in crepe satin or crepe de chine, as navy or black, with embroidery of crystal beads and silver threads. Elegance and brilliance and dignity are written all over it; besides it has the authority of Paris back of it.

When the stylist must build up the figure there are plaits and godets, flounces and inserted panels to help him out. Laces and sheer fabrics and all supple weaves of silk lend their aid to this good cause. Skirts that flare, tunics and inserts of plaited materials are some of the means by which the very thin women manage to pass for the slender figure that is fashionable.

Delicate scarfs, arm draperies or softly-flowing sleeves of chiffon, solve the problem of the sleeveless mode for thin women, and they are all stylish.

Many a coat for fall has taken unto itself a scarf to match as a life companion. Their partnership is arranged to allow temporary separations, but never, never will they be alienated since each is at its best in the company of the other. But the coat has no monopoly of scarf companionship. Many little felt hats (each accompanied by its own little felt scarf) have landed confidently in our midst and are finding a joyous welcome. Daytime dresses, not to be outdone, have also impressed scarfs into their service that can be buttoned on—and taken off indoors.

Now that the time is here for college girls to fortify themselves with new outfits they are showing a preference for the scarf-to-match affairs that are so accommodating and so chic. Here is a new and stunning camel's hair coat, with cross-bar markings, that is enough to entice the gayest subdeb back to school. It looks simple—and it is simple—but reveals in every detail an expert genius in its creator.

Plaid and stripe effects in staple coatings, novelty weaves and swagger homespuns promise our college and school girls a very satisfying experience in their coat-lore course. It is not completed until they have taken up and studied well the new ensemble suit—the dress and wrap made for each other. Sometimes the coat lining and the frock are of the same material, or the coat material is used for the lower portion of a frock with bodice of plain crepe like that used for the coat lining. Each can be used without the other, but together they speak the last word in fashions.

Stunning Camel's Hair Coat.

Glazed Onions.

Cook small white onions until soft, but firm enough to hold their shape. Make a syrup of one cupful of sugar and one-half cupful of stock and cook to the soft ball stage; add the onions and continue cooking for two or three minutes. Lift out the onions when the syrup begins to discolor and arrange on a platter with the steak.

Prune Cake.

Cream one-third of a cupful of butter and one and one-eighth of a cupful of sugar. Add two egg yolks and one whole egg, all beaten together, five tablespoonfuls of sour cream, one and one-eighth cupfuls of stewed prunes, stoned, and one-fourth of a teaspoonful of lemon extract. Sift together one and one-half cupfuls of flour, three-quarters of a teaspoonful of baking powder, one teaspoonful of soda, one-quarter teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful each of nutmeg and cloves, and add gradually one-half cupful of chopped nut meats. Bake in layers.

Now is the time, ah friend,
No longer wait,
To scatter loving smiles and words of cheer
To those around whose lives are now so dear;
They may not meet you in the coming year—
Now is the time.

FOOD FOR THE FAMILY

Most people enjoy peanuts when freshly roasted and crisp. Some find them hard to digest because they like them so well that just one more is followed by another until too many are eaten. Peanuts are full of nutriment, take the place of meat in many dishes, and are good combined with various foods. For stuffing peppers for baking, use the peanut butter or finely minced peanuts in place of meat, with the bread crumbs and other seasonings.

Peanut Butter Biscuit.—Sift two cupfuls of flour, add four teaspoonfuls of baking powder and rub in one-fourth cupful of peanut butter, one-half of a teaspoonful of salt and just enough cold water to moisten. Roll and cut into rounds and bake as usual. For variety, and a biscuit which may be used for dessert with a sauce, add a few sliced prunes to the biscuit mixture.

Peanut-Prune Shortcake.—Prepare a crust as for the peanut biscuit, make in layers, one baked on top of the other, and for the filling cut one-half pound of prunes which have been soaked overnight in cold water after being well washed, then simmered in the same water until tender, add half a cupful of sugar and cook until thick. Cool, add lemon juice and grated rind if desired, or orange juice and rind. Serve over the shortcake as one does any fruit.

The children all know the peanut butter sandwich and peanut butter fudge, using peanut butter in place of the milk and butter in ordinary fudge.

Peanut Butter Potatoes.—Cook potatoes in salted water until tender, drain and into a vegetable dish in which a tablespoonful of finely minced onion and four tablespoonfuls of peanut butter are added place potatoes, having the dish hot; season the potatoes with salt and chop them, mixing well with the butter and onion. Use a pint of potatoes to this amount of seasoning.

Some who like tomato mincemeat will enjoy this recipe:

Green Tomato Mincemeat.—Take one peck of green tomatoes, chop, drain through a cheesecloth, add two cupfuls each of water and vinegar and cook slowly two hours. Drain again, add two tablespoonfuls of salt, spices to taste, two pounds of chopped raisins, one pound of citron, two quarts of apples, one cupful of suet, all chopped; add four pounds of brown sugar, one cupful of currants and two lemons, juice and rind. Boil all together. Pack in sterilized jars.

No Privacy These Days

A flapper and her best boy were seated alone together on the sofa, listening in for the first time with the latter's new wireless set. Nor did the fact that both of them were wearing their headphones prevent them from snatching an occasional kiss. Just as they were in the middle of one particularly long drawn-out embrace came the title of the next song: "Take Those Lips Away." "Oh George," gasped the girl, as she drew back, blushing. "Oh, George, they can see us!"

Back Given Out?

Our Land Must Be Worth the Price

Our noblest sons have fought and bled
In a land beyond the sea,
That Liberty might not be lost,
That all men might be free.
And our land must well be worth the price
These patriot soldiers paid,
When they bathed the earth in their own heart's blood
And a worthy standard made.

No room in this pure and lofty air
For the man who seeks his own;
And he who grinds the poor must reap
The bitterness he has sown.
And lovers of pleasure will count for naught,
And no more in their haughty pride
Will they crush beneath their chariot wheels
The man for whom Christ died.

And man as man will stand upright
In the image of his God;
Each feel his right, as heir of the King
To home and native sod.
And each will give to the State his best,
Of the talents God has given;
And a beauty only seen in dreams
Will make earth almost Heaven.

We owe it to those who paid the price
And saved us from worse than death,
To hold our standards pure and high
As long as we have breath.
Craven the man who seeks his own
Or gains base ends by stealth,
The patriot soul has higher aims,
Than honor, fame or wealth.

And pure, God fearing statesmanship
Must guide our ship of state,
Through peaceful waters guarded by
True men both small and great.
And none may dare to touch her
With base unhallowed hand,
Our land must be safe forever more
Bought by devoted bands.

Leading Farmer Writes of Co-Operative Marketing

In a letter to the Talladega Daily Home, S. A. Burns, prominent and successful farmer of Talladega county, calls attention to the opportunity before the people of that county to add to their resources by giving more attention to the development of farming interests. Mr. Burns is a representative of Talladega county in the state legislature and was one of the leaders in organizing the Farm Bureau in Alabama. He was chosen a member of the first board of directors of that great organization and was recently re-elected for a new term. Mr. Burns' letter is reproduced here because the Reporter believes what he says about Talladega county applies also to Shelby county. He writes as follows:

"Allow me space to make a suggestion. We have organized a new Chamber of Commerce, several clubs, both for men and women, and all for the benefit of our town and county. We have installed a magnificent water system, building new churches and school houses, replacing a new gas tank in place of the old one, and our roads are above the average.

"We have an agricultural county as well as some manufacturing plants. This fertile valley, part of which is lying idle, with its rich soil, good water and delightful climate should be a wonderful asset to our county and state. With the natural facilities for hay and grain and abundant pasture grasses this valley ought to be alive with dairy and livestock farms. Poultry can be raised by the thousands. Our merchants are not doing the business they ought to, neither our bankers.

"We want more good farmers in this county and to get them we must do something that will put Talladega on the map. We want the outside world, North, East and West to inquire about Talladega, Alabama.

Co-operation is moving the world today. It is as a great thunder bolt rolling across the globe seeking every nook and corner. No man nor set of men will be able to stop it. It was the great motive power that closed the world's war; it is getting stronger every day and co-operative marketing of farm produce will spread over the country just as the boll weevil covered the cotton belt.

Shades of Romel

A London warehouseman, several of whose watchdogs have been stolen, is now using geese as watchdogs.

"There is going to be a drive put on this summer to market the cottoon crop co-operatively that will assist in a more stabilized price thereby making it a more satisfactory product to handle, both for the farmer and manufacturer. Here is my suggestion:

"Let's be the first county in the South to put it over one hundred per cent! It can be done. Let every business man and farmer put his shoulder to the wheel and every bale of cotton produced in this county in 1924 can be sold through the Farm Bureau Cotton Association. Then the eyes of the country will turn towards Talladega, wealthy farmers will flock in, knowing they will receive hearty welcome and get a fair deal. Then merchants and banks as well as other business willl prosper."

JOHNNY APPLESEED

(By John Carlyle in Birmingham Age-Herald.)

All boys and girls, and their elders, too, ought to know something about Johnny Appleseed. He is a figure of the great Middle West, but he belongs to all America. For he came out of Massachusetts where he was born just about the time the patriots were marching down the old road from Lexington to Concord in pursuit of the plan to make this a great nation.

Johnny Appleseed's real name was John Chapman. He had an overpowering hobby—rather it was a life vocation—which he worked at so tirelessly that people thought he was queer.

He was queer for he loved humanity and believed in humanity so heartily that he was unlike his neighbors.

John Chapman's great hobby was to plant appleseeds in the wilderness of early Ohio and other middle-western states. He first came to the wilderness by way of the Ohio river and a canoe. He brought with him bags of appleseeds and started nurseries along the river.

Then Johnny Appleseed started north from the river. In the clearings he started more that a hundred nurseries. He surrounded them with brush fences so that the wild animals of the forest should not undo his work.

For years this singular character trudged through the fields and ofrests of Ohio to tend his growing orchards and to deliver young trees to farmers.

Mansfield, Ohio, where he tarried for a time, erected a monument to his memory some years ago. His work is marked in other places with tablets and memorials.

Johnny Appleseed observed Scripture in that he took no thought for the morrow. For his trees and his appleseeds he received enough old clothes to cover him. The Indians never molested him because they thought he was a great medicine man. He was their friend and they were his friends.

John Chapman died about seventy-five years ago and is buried near Fort Wayne, Indiana.

He is a little-sung hero of the pioneer days in America, but he was a real benefactor and a true friend of man.

A New Currency Problem.

The greasy coin and the worn paper bill are favorite camping grounds for the grippe germ.

Soil fertility is the farmer's bank account. Are you going to maintain, and even increase your account by terracing your land and planting soil building crops like vetch and burr clover?

According to archaeologists, America's earliest civilization dates back to about 400 A. D.

"YOU AND I"

SYNOPSIS. — Transley's hay-cutting outfit, after stacking 4,000 tons, is on its way to the Y.D. ranch headquarters. Transley as a master of men and circumstances. Linder, foreman, a substantial, but not self-asserting. George Drazk, one of the men, is an irresponsible chap who proposes to every woman he meets. Transley and Linder dine with Y.D. and his wife and daughter Zen. Transley resolves to marry Zen. Y.D. instructs Transley to cut the South Y.D., "spite o' h—l an' high water" and a fellow named Landson. Drazk proposes to Zen and is neatly rebuffed. Transley pitches camp on the South Y.D. and finds Landson's outfit cutting hay. Denison Grant, Landson's manager, notifies Transley that he is working under a lease from the legal owners and warns Transley off. All of which means war. Y.D. and Zen ride to the South Y.D. Zen is a natural vamp, not yet halter-broke and ripe for mating. Y.D. has taken a liking to Transley. Zen holds Transley off and encourages Linder. Zen enjoys the prospect of a race between Transley and Linder for her favor, but secretly laughs at both. She has another and more serious encounter with Drazk. Y.D. mowing machines are ruined by iron stakes set in the grass. Zen prevents open war with Landson. Transley half-way proposes and is turned off. Drazk sets a fire that attacks the Landson stacks. The Y.D. outfit hastens to aid the enemy. Zen rides off alone to help. The wind changes and the Y.D. people now have to fight the prairie fire. Zen rides into the river to escape flames. Drazk tries to abduct her. She drowns him—or thinks she has. Grant overtakes her. In trying to ride through fire Zen is thrown and knocked senseless. Zen comes to after several hours of unconsciousness to find herself in the dark with Grant. She has a sprained ankle and both horses have run away. So she and Grant sit on a rock and tell their past lives. Grant, it appears, is a rich man's son who scorns wealth in order to live his own life.

"Well, there was more talk, and the upshot was that I got out, accompanied by an assurance from my father that I never would be burdened with any of the family ducats. Roy succeeded to the worries of wealth and I came to the ranges, where I have been able to make a living, and have, incidentally, been profoundly happy. I'll take a wager that today I look ten years younger than Roy, that I can lick him with one hand, that I have more real friends than he has, and that I'm getting more out of life than he is. I'm a man of whims. When they beckon I follow."

Grant paused, feeling that his enthusiasm had carried him into rather fuller confidences than he had intended.

"I'm sorry I bored you with that harangue," he said contritely. "You wouldn't possibly be interested in it."

"On the contrary, I am very much interested in it," she protested. "It seems so much finer for a man to make his own way, rather than be lifted up by some one else. I am sure you are already doing well in the West. Some day you will go back to your father with more money than he has."

Grant uttered an amused little laugh. "There's no sign of it yet," he said. "A ranch hand, even a foreman, doesn't need any adding machine to count his wages. Besides, I am getting other things that are more worth having."

"What other things?"

"Why, this life—its freedom, its confidence. And health! When one's soul is a-tingle what does all the rest matter?"

"But you need money, too," she added, thoughtfully. "Money is power; it is a mark of success. It would open up a wider life for you. It would bring you into new circles. Some day you will want to marry and settle down, and money would enable you to meet the kind of women—"

She stopped, confused. She had plunged farther than she had intended.

"You're all wrong," he said amusedly. It did not even occur to Zen that she was contradicting her. She had not been accustomed to being contradicted, but then, neither had she been accustomed to men like Dennison Grant, nor to conversations such as had developed. She was too interested to be annoyed.

"You're all wrong, Miss—?"

"I don't wonder that you can't fill in my name," she said. "Nobody knows Dad except as Y.D. But I heard you call me Zen——"

"That was when you were coming out of your unconsciousness. I apologize for the liberty taken. I thought it might recall you—"

"Well, I'm still coming out," she interrupted. "I am beginning to feel that I have been unconscious for a very long time indeed."

Grant was aware of a pleasant glow excited by her frank interest. She was altogether a desirable girl.

"I have observed," he said, "that poor people worry over what they haven't got, and rich people worry over what they have. It is my disposition not to worry over anything. As for opening up a wider life, what wider life could there be than this which you and I—are living?"

She wondered why he had said "you and I." Evidently he was wondering too, for he fell into reflection. She changed her position to ease the dull pain in her ankle, which his talk had almost driven from her mind. The rock had a perpendicular edge, so she let her feet hang over, resting the injured one upon the other. He was sitting in a similar position. The silence of the night had gathered about them, broken occasionally by the yapping of coyotes far down the valley. Segments of dull light fringed the horizon; the breeze was again blowing from the west, mild and balmy. Presently one of the segments of light grew and grew. It was as though it were rushing up the valley. They watched it, fascinated; then burst into laughter as the orb of the moon became recognizable. . . . There was something very companionable about watching the moon rise, as they did.

Zen had a feeling of being very happy. True, a certain haunting spectre at times would break into her consciousness, but in the companionship of such a man as Grant she could easily beat it off. She studied the face in the moon, and invited her soul. She was living through a new experience—an experience she could not understand. In spite of the discomfort of her injuries, in spite of the events of the day, she was very, very happy. . . .

If only that horrid memory of Drazk would not keep tormenting her! She began to have some glimpse of what remorse must mean. She did not blame herself; she could not have done otherwise; and yet—it was horrible to think about, and it would not stay away. She felt a tremendous desire to tell Grant all about it. . . . She wondered how much he knew. He must have discovered that her clothing had been wet.

She shivered slightly.

"You're cold," he said, as he placed his arm about her.

"I'm a little chilly," she admitted. "I had to swim my horse across the river today—he got into a deep spot—and I got wet." She congratulated herself that she had made a very clever explanation.

He put his coat about her shoulders and drew it tight. Then he sat beside her in silence. There were many things he could have said, but this seemed to be neither the time nor the place. Grant was not Transley. He had for this girl a delicate consideration which Transley's nature could never know. Grant was a thinker—Transley a doer. Grant knew that the charm which enveloped him in this girl's presence was the perfectly natural product of a set of conditions. He was worldly-wise enough to suspect that Zen also felt that charm. It was as natural as the bursting of a seed in moist soil; as natural as the unfolding of a rose in warm air. . . .

Presently he felt her head rest against his shoulder. He looked down upon her in awed delight. Her eyes had closed; her lips were smiling faintly; her figure had relaxed. He could feel her warm breath upon his face. He could have touched her lips with his.

Slowly the moon traced its long arc in the heavens.

CHAPTER VII

Just as the first flush of dawn mellowed the east Grant heard the pounding of horses' feet and the sound of voices borne across the valley. They rapidly approached; he could tell by the hard pounding of the hoofs that they were on a trail which he took to be the one he had followed before he met Zen. It passed possibly a hundred yards to the left. He must in some way make his presence known.

The girl had slept soundly, almost without stirring. Now he must wake her. He shook her gently, and called her name; her eyes opened; he could see them, strange and wondering, in the thin gray light. Then, with a sudden start, she was quite awake.

"I have been sleeping!" she exclaimed, reproachfully. "You let me sleep!"

"No use of two watching the moon," he returned, lightly.

"But you shouldn't have let me sleep," she reprimanded. "Besides, you had to stay awake. You have had no sleep at all!"

There was a sympathy in her voice very pleasant to the ear. But Grant could not continue so delightful an indulgence.

"I had to wake you," he exclaimed. "There are several people riding up the valley; undoubtedly a search party. I must attract their attention."

They listened, and could now hear the hoofbeats close at hand. Grant called; not a loud shout; it seemed little more than his speaking voice, but instantly there was silence, save for the echo of the sound rolling down the valley. Then a voice answered, and Grant gave a word or two of directions. In a minute or two several horsemen loomed up through the vague light.

"Here we are," said Zen, as she distinguished her father. "Gone lame on the off foot and held up for repairs."

Y.D. swung down from his saddle. "Are you all right, Zen?" he cried, as he advanced with outstretched arms. There was an eagerness and a relief in his voice which would have surprised many who knew Y.D. only as a shrewd cattleman.

Zen accepted and returned his embrace, with a word of assurance that she was really nothing the worse. Then she introduced her companion.

"This is Mr. Dennison Grant, foreman of the Landson ranch, Dad."

Grant extended his hand, but Y.D. hesitated. The truce occasioned by the fire did not by any means imply permanent peace. Far from it, with the valley in ruins—.

Y.D. was stiffening, but his daughter averted what would in another moment have been an embarrassing situation with a quick remark.

"This is no time, even for explanations," she said, "except that Mr. Grant saved my life last evening at the risk of his own, and has lost a night's sleep for his pains."

"That was a man's work," said Y.D. It would not have been possible for his lips to have framed a greater compliment. "I'm obliged to you, Grant. You know how it is with us cattlemen; we run mostly to horn and hoofs, but I suppose we have some heart, too, if you can find it."

They shook hands with as much cordiality as the situation permitted, and then Zen introduced Transley and Linder, who were in the party. There were two or three others whom she did not know, but they all shook hands.

"What happened, Zen?" said Transley, with his usual directness. "Give us the whole story."

Then she told them what she knew, from the point where she had met Grant on the fire-encircled hill.

"Two lucky people—two lucky people," was all Transley's comment. Words could not have expressed the jealousy he felt. But Linder was not too shy to place his hand with a friendly pressure upon Grant's shoulder.

"Good work," he said, and with two words sealed a friendship.

Two of the unnamed members of the party volunteered their horses to Zen and Grant, and all hands started back to camp. Y.D. talked almost garrulously; not even himself had known how heavily the hand of Fate had lain on him through the night.

Y.D. Exploded in Somewhat Ineffective Profanity.

"The haymakin' is all off, Darter," he said. "We will trek back to the Y.D. as soon as you see fit. The steers will have to take chances next winter."

The girl professed her fitness to make the trip at once, and indeed they did make it that very day. Y.D. pressed Grant to remain for breakfast, and Tompkins, notwithstanding the demoralization of equipment and supplies effected by the fire, again excelled himself. After breakfast the old rancher found occasion for a word with Grant.

"You know how it is, Grant," he said. "There's a couple of things that ain't explained, an' perhaps it's as well all round not to press for opinions. I don't know how the iron stakes got in my meadow, an' you don't know how the fire got in yours. But I give you Y.D.'s word—which goes at par except in a cattle trade—" and Y.D. laughed cordially at his own limitations—"I give you my word that I don't know any more about the fire than you do."

"And I don't know anything more about the stakes than you do," returned Grant.

"Well, then, let it stand at that. But mind," he added, with returning heat, "I'm not committin' myself to anythin' in advance. This grass 'll grow again next year, an' by heavens if I want it I'll cut it!- No son of a sheep herder can bluff Y.D.!"

Grant did not reply. He had heard enough of Y.D.'s boisterous nature to make some allowances.

"An' mind I mean it," continued Y.D., whose chagrin over being baffled out of a thousand tons of hay overrode, temporarily at least, his appreciation of Grant's services. "Mind, I mean it. No monkey-doodles next season, young man."

Obviously Y.D. was becoming worked up, and it seemed to Grant that the time had come to speak.

"There will be none," he said, quietly. "If you come over the hills to cut the South Y.D. next summer I will personally escort you home again."

Y.D. stood open-mouthed. It was preposterous that this young upstart foreman on a second-rate ranch like Landson's should deliberately defy him.

"You see, Y.D.," continued Grant, with provoking calmness, "I've seen the papers. You've run a big bluff in this country. You've occupied rather more territory than was coming to you. In a word, you've been a good bit of a bully. Now—let me break it to you gently—those good old days are over. In future you're going to stay on your side of the line. If you crowd over you'll be pushed back. You have no more right to the hay in this valley than you have to the hide on Landson's steers, and you're not going to cut it any more, at all."

Y.D. exploded in somewhat ineffective profanity. He had a wide vocabulary of invective, but most of it was of the stand-and-fight variety. There is some language which is not to be used, unless you are willing to have it out on the ground, there and then. Y.D. had no such desire. Possibly a curious sense of honor entered into the case. It was not fair to call a young man names, and although there was considerable truth in Grant's remark that Y.D. was a bully, his bullying did not take that form. Possibly, also, he recalled at that moment the obligation under which Zen's accident had placed him. At any rate he wound up rather lamely.

"Grant," he said, "if I want that hay next year I'll cut it, spite o' h—l an' high water."

"All right, Y.D.," said Grant, cheerfully. "We'll see. Now, if you can spare me a horse to ride home, I'll have him sent back immediately."

Y.D. went to find Transley and arrange for a horse, and in a moment Zen appeared from somewhere.

"You've been quarreling with Dad," she said, half reproachfully, and yet in a tone which suggested that she could understand.

"Not exactly that," he parried. "We were just having a frank talk with each other."

"I know something of Dad's frank talks. . . . I'm sorry. . . . I would have liked to ask you to come and see me—to see us—my mother would be glad to see you. I can hardly ask you to come if you are going to be bad friends with Dad."

"No, I suppose not," he admitted.

"You were very good to me; very—decent," she continued.

At that moment Transley, Linder and Y.D. appeared, with two horses.

"Linder will ride over with you and bring back the spare beast," said Y.D.

Grant shook hands, rather formally, with Y.D. and Transley, and then with Zen. She murmured some words of thanks, and just as he would have withdrawn his hand he felt her fingers tighten very firmly about his. He answered the pressure, and turned quickly away.

Transley immediately struck camp, and Y.D. and his daughter drove homeward, somewhat painfully, over the blackened hills.

Transley lost no time in finding other employment. It was late in the season to look for railway contracts, and continued dry weather had made grading, at best, a somewhat difficult business. Influx of ready money and of those who follow it had created considerable activity in a neighboring center which for twenty years had been the principal cow-town of the foothill country. In defiance of all tradition, and, most of all, in defiance of the predictions of the ranchers who had known it so long for a cow-town and nothing more, the place began to grow. No one troubled to inquire exactly why it should grow, or how. As for Transley, it was enough for him that team labor was in demand. He took a contract, and three days after the fire in the foothills he was excavating for business blocks about to be built in the new metropolis.

It was no part of Transley's plan, however, to quite lose touch with the people on the Y.D. They were, in fact, the center about which he had been doing some very serious thinking. His outspokenness with Zen and her father had had in it a good deal of bravado—the bravado of a man who could afford to lose the stake, and smile over it. In short, he had not cared whether he offended them or not. Transley was a very self-reliant contractor; he gave, even to the millionaire rancher, no more homage than he demanded in return. . . . Still, Zen was a very desirable girl. As he turned the matter over in his mind Transley became convinced that he wanted Zen. With Transley, to want a thing meant to get it. He always found a way. And he was now quite sure that he wanted Zen. He had not known that positively until the morning when he found her in the gray light of dawn with Dennison Grant. There was a suggestion of companionship there between the two which had cut him to the quick. Like most ambitious men, Transley was intensely jealous.

No more haying and the fight off. What is Transley's next move to win Zen?

Lesson for September 21

JESUS MAKING A MISSIONARY TOUR

LESSON TEXT—Mark 1:35-45.

GOLDEN TEXT—Thou canst make me clean.—Mark 1:40.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Healing a Leper.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus and the Believing Leper.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Jesus, the Great Physician.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Medical Missions.

I. Jesus Praying (v. 35).

After a series of most strenuous efforts, Jesus retired to a lonely place to pray. Doubtless He felt the need of having His spiritual strength recruited. He who the day before had shown His mighty power in casting out devils and banishing disease now needed to be alone with God. In order to do this He arose long before daylight. He had slept at Peter's house and withdrew to a solitary place unperceived. The very best time to pray is in the morning when our physical powers have been renewed.

II. Found by Peter (vv. 36, 37).

His work of the preceding day had made such a profound impression that the multitudes sought Him. Since the people were so aroused the disciples thought that it was the opportune time to press the campaign. For that reason Peter, and perhaps Andrew, James and John, eagerly sought Him and told Him what the multitudes were doing.

III. Preaching in Other Towns (vv. 38, 39).

The great Missionary persisted in His program despite the success which had attended His efforts at Capernaum. Popularity in a given place is not the criterion by which to determine the wisdom of remaining there. He preached in their synagogues throughout all Galilee and cast out demons, for it was for this very purpose that He came forth from the Heavenly Father.

IV. Jesus Heals a Leper (vv. 40-45).

This deed is highly significant. It not only shows His mighty power and divine love but it is symbolical. Leprosy is a type of sin.

(1) It was defiling. The leper was an outcast because of this defilement. Sin banishes from the presence of God.

(2) It was incurable. There was no cure for leprosy. Only God could cure it. So there was but one remedy for the cancellation of guilt—the removal of man's sin—that is the cross of Christ.

(3) It is contagious. It spreads from one to another. Segregation was necessary in order to keep it from spreading. Sin is contagious.

(4) It is in the blood. Sin is hereditary.

1. His Great Need (v. 40). This caused him to break through all ceremonial regulations and cast himself at the Savior's feet. The sinner's great need should cause him to break through all barriers and cast himself at the feet of Jesus.

2. His Request (v. 40).

He was quite sure of Jesus' ability to cure him. He knew quite well that no human physician could do this but he was somewhat doubtful as to His willingness. We can be assured today, not only of His ability, but His willingness.

3. The Compassionate Lord (v. 41). He put forth His hand and touched the leper. Only the divine Lord could touch a leper and not be defiled. Accompanying the touch was the declaration of His willingness to heal. No doubt this greatly strengthened the leper's faith but startled the people who looked on.

4. An Immediate Cure (v. 42). Divine healing is always instantaneous and complete. This is the outstanding difference between divine healing and the so-called "faith healing."

5. His Stern Charge (vv. 43, 44). Christ dismissed him with a strict charge that he should not make this known. The reason for this was that wide publicity would create such excitement as to interfere with His preaching. Furthermore, he was still ceremonially unclean. His going to the priests with a proper offering would indicate his regard for the laws and customs of Moses and therefore disarm prejudice.

6. Willful Disobedience (v. 45). Instead of rendering grateful obedience he blazed it abroad and thus hindered the Lord's work. Thus we see that the stupid self will of one man may prevent many from hearing and seeing the blessings of the Lord's preaching and healing.

Revelation of the Ideal

The candor of a child, unconscious of its own beauty and seeing God clear as the daylight, is the great revelation of the ideal.—Renan.

God's Stewards

Life

Life is meant for work, and not for ease.—Kingsley.

SUFFERED MANY YEARS WITH FEMALE TROUBLE

PE-RU-NA LIKE A GIFT FROM HEAVEN

Mrs. Katie Scheffel, R. F. D. No. 5, Lowell, Ohio

"I have been suffering for years with female trouble. Was operated on five years ago. It relieved me some but I did not regain my strength. Two years later was taken sick and bedfast several months. I treated a long while without much relief. I was discouraged, my mind affected, so nervous I could neither eat or sleep and unable to do anything.

We tried several doctors but one after another gave up my case as hopeless. Finally a good friend advised me to try Pe-ru-na. I did. It relieved me almost immediately. Your medical department said I was suffering from chronic catarrh of the system. I began taking your medicine in March, 1914, and continued until August. I took ten bottles of Pe-ru-na and three bottles of Man-a-lin and felt like a new person. Your medicine seemed like a gift from Heaven. It was like coming from darkness into light.

We have used your medicine since for coughs, colds and grip with good results. We will always keep it on hand. I weigh twenty-five pounds more than I ever did, eat and sleep well and can do a good day's work. Everybody says I look fine. Even the doctors are surprised. I cannot thank you enough and will always recommend Pe-ru--na to sufferers from catarrh."

Quaint Bell Superstitions

For many years it was believed that the ringing of bells dispelled thunder. Records of English churchwardens occasionally have reference to this idea. In those of Sandwich, dated 1464, an item is set down for bread and drink supplied to "ryngers in the great thunderyng." Many and various were the ancient offices of bells. According to some monkish couplets the mottoes of a chime, one bell says, "Men's death I tell, by doleful knell"; another, "The winds so fierce I do disperse"; and a third, "Lightning and thunder I break asunder." Rural bell ringers often have a great affection for their bells, and in the superstitious way of their fathers ascribe to each some special virtue.

Time to Select Seed Corn

(By A. A. Lauderdale, County Agent, Shelby County)

1.Select seed corn in the field this fall to increase your yield next year.

The following are 5 important points to consider in selecting seed corn:

1. Select only from stalks having two good ears.
2. Select strong vigorous stalks which are neither broken, weak nor diseased.
3. Select from hills which have no missing hills adjoining.
4. Ears should be at medium height on the stalk and hanging down at maturity.
5. Select ears with medium shanks and long close fitting shucks.

II. Plant fall oats to take care of your feed shortage next spring. feed will be high at that time.

III. Save all available hay this fall, for your stock will need it before pastures are ready in the spring.

IV. Keep up production in your milk cows by feeding green crops or probably some grain in addition to pasture. When you once let your cows drop off in production, they will not come back to normal production during the present lactation period, regardless of how much you feed.

V. Cotton stalks should be turned under as soon as you get your cotton picked, in order to destroy the food supply of the boll weevil. Ifyou can cut off the food supply 3 or 4 weeks before frost, you will destroy a large percentage of the weevils. Don't wait on your neighbor, but destroy your stalks, and he will do likewise.

A West Virginia Democrat named his new son, John W. Davis, and his Republican neighbor to go him one better, named his twin boys Heli and Mariah.

Thousands of Americans Are Earning Their Living From The Railroads

Yet their names do not appear on the railroads' payrolls. General prosperity comes and goes as the railroads make or fail to make money.

Look at these figures and you will probably have brought home to you more forcefully than ever before the danger of the enactment of any destructive form of railroad legislation.

One miner out of every four gets his entire living from the railroads.

Three out of every ten men employed in the steel mills are supported exclusively by the railroads.

The railroad is the only visible means of support of one-fourth of those employed in the lumber industry.

Of every 100 gallons of crude petroleum produced from American wells, the railroads purchase 11 gallons.

Think of the importance of these four great industries to America. Read the above figures again; and remember that when the railroads prosper, everybody prospers.

Enormous Sums Expended To Enlarge Telephone Service

THE enormous amount of new telephone construction under way in Alabama has made necessary a programme of activity rarely before equalled in the telephone industry.

During the first six months of this year additional equipment, apparatus, cable and telephones have been installed at a cost of approximately $625,131.

There remains to be completed during the balance of this year similar new construction costing approximately $801,869.

The new facilities provided in this manner enabled the telephone workers to install 7619 new telephones during the six month period, resulting in a net gain of 3239 stations.

At the beginning of the year it was estimated that there would be 7423 installations and a net gain of 2839 stations during the first six months. The telephone programme is therefore much ahead of the schedule.

New construction work costing $801,869 is now under way or will be started during the balance of this year.

Safeguarding Continuous Twenty-Four Hour Power Service in ALABAMA

Never in the history of Alabama Power Company operations in Alabama has power been curtailed to industry or the service of the people.

Acequate—continuous—uninterrupted 24 hour service has been consistently maintained by Alabama Power Company to all of its customers and at all times.

This remarkable record has been achieved in Alabama through maintenance of—

EIGHT Reserve Steam Plants

WITH A COMBINED CAPACITY OF 128,200 HORSE POWER

Strategically located to supply deficiencies in water power which sometimes arise as a result of drought such as we are now having in consequence of reduced stream flow. The present dry period is almost unprecedented.

These eight plants located at Gorgas, Gadsden, Montgomery, Selma, Huntsville, Tuscaloosa, Decatur and Marion, were built at a cost of many millions of dollars to safeguard continuous power service for Alabama.

In emergencies Alabama Power Company may also use the power stations of certain customers. These available stations will produce 23,700 additional horsepower.

The company also leases from the United States government the Sheffield Steam Plant with a capacity of 80,000 horsepower, giving Alabama

A Steam Power Reserve of 231,900 Horsepower

Which is probably the greatest steam reserve maintained by any American Power Company in proportion to its hydro-electric generating capacity.

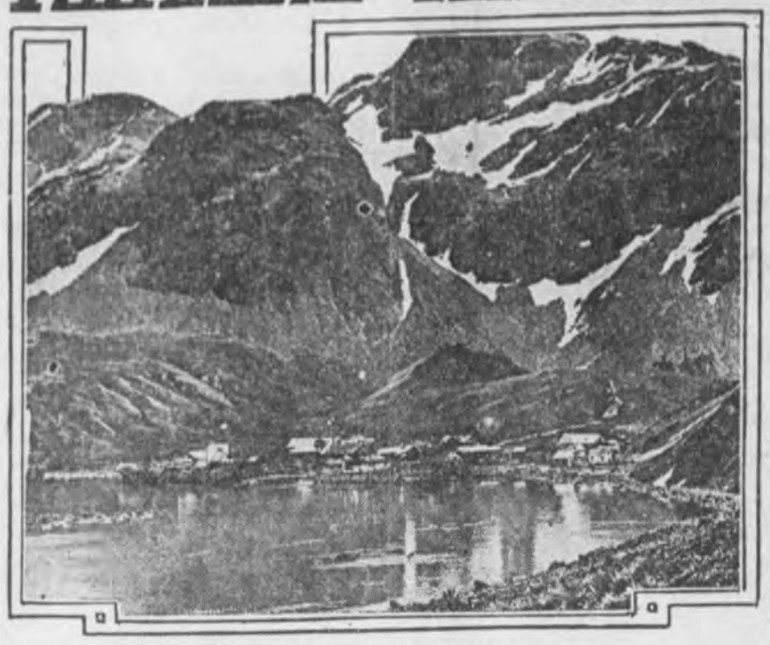
Falkland Islands



Whaling Station on South Georgia.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

A falling off in production from the famous North sea fisheries that made Great Britain largely a nation of mariners and so contributed to the building up of the world's greatest navy, has set Englishmen to speculating on the possibility of developing another great fishing region about the Falkland islands.

This island group and its dependencies constitute Great Britain's southernmost possession. The Falklands lie in the South Atlantic 300 miles off the coast of Argentina. They are farther north than Cape Horn, opposite the eastern entrance to the Strait of Magellan. Port Stanley, capital of the far southern colony, has a southern latitude exactly the same as the northern latitude of London, but it has a far different climate from that of the British metropolis for no friendly, warm Gulf stream bathes the Falklands to rescue it from the natural cold temperatures of its position.

More to the point, the Falklands have both a latitude and a longitude corresponding to that of Newfoundland in the northern hemisphere. Between the islands and South America are banks where cool and warm ocean currents come together as they do on the Newfoundland banks. Such a meeting of waters of strikingly different temperatures furnishes an ideal environment for fish life; and it is on these banks westward from the Falklands that certain far-seeing Britons hope to build up fisheries that will make good the waning fish supply from the North sea.

The difficulties in the way of establishing a second North sea or Newfoundland banks fishery near the Falklands are the long haul and adverse climatic conditions for curing fish. Whale fishing has already proved profitable in spite of the islands' remoteness, and it is believed that canning or freezing will eliminate the other difficulty.

The Falkland group is composed of two large islands, East Falkland and West Falkland, and about 100 smaller islets. Altogether they cover an area of about 6,500 miles, being thus about the size of the Hawaiian group. East Falkland is nearly as large as Porto Rico. The area of West Falkland is slightly less than that of the state of Delaware.

Not Very Cold, but Cheerless.

Though the climate of the Falklands is relatively mild—far warmer than Newfoundland in a corresponding latitude—it is cheerless. On two days out of three on an average rain falls or it is foggy. Though the thermometer never sinks very low, it never rises very high; the annual mean is 43 degrees Fahrenheit. The ground never dries, a fact which prevents the use of the large quantities of peat in the islands, and has necessitated the breeding of a hardy type of sheep whose hoofs will not become diseased.

The islands are treeless and largely of rolling contour, with a backbone of exposed rocky ranges. On the moors, which resemble those of the Scottish West Highlands, a coarse grass grows which has so far largely determined the economic activities of the Falklands, for it makes excellent grazing for sheep. Practically every square foot of the islands that is put to any use at all is used as sheep range, and there are now between 600,000 and 700,000 sheep in the colony. A hybrid type has been developed that is admirably adapted to conditions. The wool has distinctive properties, especially a fine texture which makes it particularly well fitted for making hosiery and gloves.

The concentration of sheep on some of the islands has greatly injured the grass and in late years it has been necessary to reduce the flocks. Lately factories have appeared to can mutton products. The ranching is done mostly by large companies who may own entire islands. As many as 200,000 sheep are kept on a single ranch. The shepherds who maintain this far southern live stock industry are mostly from the British Isles, largely from Scotland.

Little Overland Travel.

Because of the bogs and the rough ridges there is little overland travel in the Falklands. No roads exist, and what little movement takes place on land is by horseback or on foot. The coasts are deeply indented and most ranch headquarters are on some tiny harbor. Mail and supplies are distributed by water despite the prevalence of rough weather.

Port Stanley, capital of the Falklands and its dependencies, has a population of about 900 people, a third of the entire population of the Falklands. The harbor is excellent, being practically land-locked, and flanked by high rock ridges which screen its waters from the winds. Situated as it is near Cape Horn, this harbor has long been a refuge for ships battered by rough seas in their trips around South America. Even now scarcely a month passes that some vessel, minus a mast, or otherwise crippled, does not limp into Port Stanley. Because of this strategic position the little town has built up a considerable ship-repair industry.

Few British colonies are as isolated as the Falklands. Save for straggling ships or whalers the islands have contact with the outside world only once each month through mail steamers plying between Great Britain and the coast of Chile. During the World war this isolation was broken by unwelcome visits from German war vessels. Numerous whaling ships operating from the Falklands were sent to the bottom, and in December, 1914, a German squadron fresh from having defeated the British in the Battle of Coronel off the Chilean coast, approached the Falklands with the idea of seizing them. But a strong British naval force was in Port Stanley harbor and in the ensuing battle of the Falklands all but one of the German ships were sent to the bottom.

The Falkland Dependencies.

By official proclamation in 1917, Great Britain added to the Falklands colony thousands of square miles known as the Falkland Island Dependencies. These include the island of South Georgia east of the Falklands, the South Odkneys and the South Shetlands, somewhat farther south than Cape Horn and Graham Land and Coats Land, the former largely within the Antarctic circle and the latter wholly within that zone of cold. None of these lands save South Georgia can be inhabited by Europeans the year round, but they and their neighboring waters are extremely valuable because of their whale fisheries. This is now the world's most important whaling region, contributing a greater catch annually than all other whaling areas combined.

So long as other regions were well stocked with whales, only desultory whaling was carried on near the Falklands. The industry has been conducted in earnest in these waters only since the beginning of the present century. It was left to the enterprise of Norwegians to open the field, and these modern vikings dominate the industry. Whaling adds much to Port Stanley's importance and prosperity. This is the chief supply station and base of operations. Oil is the principal product derived from whales. It is extracted from the fat of the animals in factories operated during the open season on the shores of the dependencies, or in "floating factories," former ocean steamers fitted up for the purpose, which follow the whaling fleet around. All whale products are cleared from Port Stanley, and constitute the Falklands' chief export, greatly surpassing wool and mutton in value. During the World war when there was great demand for whale oil as a basis of glycerine for explosives, more than $5,000,000 worth of oil was exported annually.

Gets Rid of Rats

A Detroit merchant has perfected a device which has cleared his store of rats in a very short time, he says. It has a box on the floor, with a door swinging from its upper edge. The door is smeared with cheese, and when the rat pushes on it, it opens and admits him to a small compartment with a hole into a huge tank of water where he drowns. The trap is very effective, and has to be emptied every day.

WOMEN NEED SWAMP-ROOT

Women's complaints often prove to be nothing else but kidney trouble, or the result of kidney or bladder disease.

If the kidneys are not in a healthy condition they may cause the other organs to become diseased.

Pain in the back, headache, loss of ambition, nervousness are oftentimes symptoms of kidney trouble.

Don't delay starting treatment. Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, a physician's prescription, obtained at any drug store, may be just the remedy needed to overcome such conditions.

BREEDING ENTHUSIASM FOR THE FARM

Porter, Mo., used to be a community with its tail between its legs. At the schoolhouse, for instance, flapping wall paper, fallen plaster, broken panes at unshaded windows corresponded with the peeling paint, ripped clapboards, treeless yard of a neglected rural school. Tramps added filth. Porter children went to Kirksville to school—later to Kirksville or elsewhere to live—if they could possibly escape the blight at home. Farming was becoming a despised pursuit.

Today Porter has seen co-operative buying, good roads, blooded stock, a demonstration farm on the one hand, and a young folks' band, an interdenominational Sunday school, and college entrance courses on the other; increased its real estate values, substituted a community for a neighborhood divided against itself, and turned its children into Porter and farm enthusiasts. Its Farmers' week and home economics course, conducted annually by the university, are famous throughout the state for the local support given by old and young.

At the heart of the new Porter is its once-despised school. At the innermost heart of all the development is the Porter school teacher, Marie Turner Harvey. She is one of those more than wise folk, a leader who knows when not to lead. From the six-year-old whose English and penmanship, arithmetic and farming lessons become vitally important affairs when she can sum them up in a triumphant sentence, "I planted a 60-foot row of onions today," to the erstwhile enemies who discover unexpected good in each other while reroofing the school building so as not to raise their tax rate, Mrs. Harvey has taught the community to discover its own powers.

A dozen years ago, in the Kirksville schools, Mrs. Harvey had realized that, while she was teaching Porter children to be good citizens of Kirksville, the more successful a teacher she was, the more the rural community suffered. In 1912, parents of some Porter children who were growing up scornful of the home place, asked her to make over their own school.

Mrs. Harvey won conservative farmers by having the old schoolhouse repaired instead of approving the proposed new building. She insisted on the dignity of a house of her own, even though the only empty house was a tumble-down $5 a month cottage. She weathered threatened injunction suits, "stacked" school board elections and underground scandal started by the group who suspected a nigger in the woodpile when a high-priced teacher voluntarily came to Porter at $50 a month. The three years she promised to give have grown to ten. Still Porter finds room for growth. Still it begs for more of Mrs. Harvey's sort of domination over its affairs.

THE DRAMA OF SERVICE

Have you ever noticed that people who are very sure of what they want travel so directly that there seems to be little of drama in their lives, while huge dramatic forces war through them as agents? Up in Westchester county, New York, last fall, there was an election for one county office that people were watching in and out of the state with keenest interest. Westchester was one of the first three counties in New York to plan a children's court. It decided on $10,000 for the judge's salary.

Enter the war. On one side the old-timers who could not conceive that such a salary should be anything but a reward for the politically faithful. On the other the folks who had dreamed and fought to get the state law through and the court established for the sake of the children, and who demanded that the training of the judge must be the first consideration.

The battle was hot. The chosen candidate of many of the socially-minded was Ruth Taylor of White Plains. The Republicans nominated her. The Democrats, forced by public sentiment, nominated a man who took the job, rather than the salary, seriously. It was a Democratic year, but the friends of the children won, nevertheless.

Miss Taylor, who calmly went on supervising expenditures of $450,000 annually, with a staff of 43, is director of the county department of child welfare. At Vassar college she chose economics and sociology because she wanted to specialize in child welfare work. That led her to the study of state laws affecting the protection of children and young girls.

"If a person starting in social work today has a good deal of courage and something of the spirit of pioneering," advises Ruth Taylor, "I should strongly recommend her to try rural work. A worker must have the ability to work indefinitely with little encouragement or outside stimulus. However, there is a tremendous field for usefulness. Many of the rural problems are barely discovered and entirely unsolved, and much of the future welfare of the country depends on ability to understand and solve them."

HOW TO KEEP WELL

Dr. Frederick R. Green, Editor of "Health."

(©, 1924, Western Newspaper Union.)

DANGER OF POOR EYES

POOR lighting and poor eyesight are responsible for one of every eight accidents.

Dr. R. E. Simpson, the engineer of the Travelers' Insurance company of Hartford, Conn., has made a nation-wide study of the relation between accidents and vision. In a recent report to the Eyesight Conservation council he states that not only is poor eyesight one of the important causes of accidents, but that 66 per cent of American workmen have some defect of vision.

Good eyesight has always been an important factor in man's welfare. Among primitive men, living under natural conditions, it was probably the most important condition, not only for the avoidance of accidents, but also for the preservation of life itself.

The primitive savage came into a world in which everything was against him. He had no weapons to defend himself against savage animals or equally savage human enemies, except a stone or a club torn from a tree. Even if he were stronger than his enemies this availed him nothing unless he could see his enemy before his enemy saw him. He got his food from trees and bushes and from the bodies of wild animals killed in the chase. Unless he had sharp eyes he could not find and catch his dinner. The man with the best eyes got the best food and was best able to protect himself.

We are living today in an artificial and mechanical world, but the same principles are still in force.

The child with defective vision cannot take part in its companions' sports and pastimes, and so grows up with a weak and undeveloped body. Its poor vision exposes it to many dangers which its sharp-eyed companions avoid. The near-sighted child cannot see the approaching street car, railroad train or automobile.

Among grownups the near-sighted workman is more liable to accident than his normal associates.

"Accidents do happen," says Doctor Simpson. "There is a reason back of each one."

"An appalling number of accidents is due to defective vision. Sight is the most valuable protection against bodily injuries. Many workers start in handicapped by imperfect vision. Any workman whose eyesight is below normal is not only an unsatisfactory worker, but is also a source of danger to himself and others."

If you are a parent, see that your child's eyes are tested and, if his vision is below normal, give him glasses that will put him on an equality with his playmates.

If you are a working man or woman, don't allow yourself to be handicapped by imperfect vision. Have your eyes examined, and if your vision is not normal get glasses that will enable you to do satisfactory work and that will protect you against accidents due to imperfect sight.

REMOVING THE TONSILS

REMOVING the tonsils in children is now a common operation. In extreme cases, where the child has had repeated attacks of tonsilitis, where the tonsils are so large as to interfere with breathing, or where the child is plainly being poisoned by absorption from the infected glands, there is no question as to the need and value of this treatment.

But how about the child with an occasional "sore throat" and moderately enlarged tonsils who is not quite as strong and well nourished as a healthy child should be? Will the removal of the tonsils benefit this child?

An answer to this question, on a large scale, has recently been given by Dr. Albert D. Kaiser of Rochester, N. Y. In a recent issue of the "Journal of the American Medical Association," he gives the results of a comparison of 1,200 children who had had their tonsils removed, with 1,200 who had not.

Three years ago a careful physical examination of all the school children in Rochester was made. A large number of children with diseased tonsils were found. The parents were asked in each case if they wished their child's tonsils removed. Over 5,000 children, with the consent of their parents, had their diseased tonsils taken out. Doctor Kaiser's report covers the present condition of 1,200 of these children as compared with the same number who were not operated on.

He finds that the children whose tonsils were removed have had fewer sore throats and colds during the last three years than those who did not have them removed; that it has reduced the amount of diphtheria and heart disease; and that the growth and nutrition of the children operated on are much better than those who kept their tonsils.

Doctor Kaiser's report shows that removal of the tonsils prevents any further attacks of "sore throat" due to inflammation of the tonsils. But it does more than this. It also reduces the danger of other throat infections.

Most children who have frequent "sore throats" are below the average in strength and resistance. The infected tonsils are an added handicap. Removing them gives the child a better chance to resist other children's diseases.

How Two Mothers Helped Their Daughters by Giving them Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Every mother possesses information of vital importance to her young daughter, and the responsibility for the girl's future is largely in her hands.

When a school girl's thoughts become sluggish, when she suffers the consequences of wet feet, pain, headaches, fainting spells, loss of sleep and appetite and is irregular, her mother should have a care for her physical condition and give her Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, which has proved a reliable aid to nature for just such conditions in so many cases.

First Bottle Helped Her

Richmond, Indiana.—"I am sending this letter to tell you how much good Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound did my daughter. She was troubled with nervousness so that she was restless at night, and then she could not sleep and she was afraid of everything. She could not work as she was not strong enough, and she had to quit school at 14 because she was ill so much. The doctor said she had a nervous breakdown and her system was all run down. She had pains in her right side and through her back, and the medicine she took did her no good at all. I saw Lydia E. Pinkham's advertisement in our paper, telling all that the Vegetable Compound had done for other women, so I said, 'We will try it out and see what it does.' She had not taken the first bottle before it began to help her, and we will always say that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the best medicine she ever took."—Mrs. E. DARBY, 911 N. 16th Street, Richmond, Indiana.

An Ohio Mother Reports

Columbus, Ohio. — "When my daughter became 14 years of age she was ailing very much. The doctor gave her medicine, but she was very weak, and he always had to write excuses for her as she could not attend the 'gym' classes, and I often had to keep her home from school. I had taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for my nerves and run-down condition, so I gave her three doses daily, and also Lydia E. Pinkham's Blood Medicine. Our friends are surprised to see how fine and tall she is getting and how well she is. I will gladly answer letters and give you a fine recommendation for other mothers." — Mrs. MARIE MIELKE, 814 Ebner Street, Columbus, Ohio.

Over 100,000 women have so far replied to our question, "Have you received benefit from taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound?"

98 per cent. of these replies answer "Yes." That means that 98 out of every 100 women who have taken this medicine have been helped by it. For sale by druggists everywhere.

Many Alabama Farms Are Under Mortgage

Over half of the farms of Alabama are under mortgage, according to F. W. Gist, agricultural statistician, who has recently completed a suvey of farm indebtedness in the state. Eighteen per cent of the lands, nearly one-fifth, are mortgaged for short time loans and nearly one-third of the lands for long time loans.

More than one-half the farmers in the state who own their own lands give crop liens for advances. Of these 37 per cent give liens to banks and 13 per cent give liens to merchants. Over 70 per cent of the tenant farmers in Alabama mortgage their crops in advance to secure supplies, 40 percent to banks and 30 per cent to merchants.

Frank Fulton who has been for the past four years with T. R. Walton, has accepted a place with the E. M. Jones Auto Company and will begin work October 1st.

FINE START MADE AT SHELBY HIGH School Is Well Organized In All Departments

Shelby County High School is starting the new year with every prospect of a successful term, according to Principal J. M. Tucker. The school has been thoroughly organized and everybody has settled down to steady work. A fine chool spirit prevails.

The different classes held their organization meetings recently and officers to serve for the year were chosen. The Longfellow and Poe literary societies have taken up their work also. New officers have been elected and plans made for a good year's work.

The departments of Vocational Home Economics and Vocational Agriculture are starting off with the most encouraging prospects ahead. The enrollment in both departments is good and there is a fine interest in the work.

Miss Winters, the teacher in charge of the Home Economics department, has made a new arrangement for her work that will make it possible for every girl in school who desires to take this training to do so. She has leased the home of Mrs. Ada Pitts on College street and has equipped it as a home economics building and all her teaching will be done there. It will also serve as a home for Miss Winters and the practice teachers from Alabama College during the school year. This arrangement will greatly relieve the crowded condition at the high school proper, that prevailed all last year.

In athletics there is every promise of the usual good year; Shelby High will again give a good account of herself in football. Practice is going on every day, and the boys are putting real work into it. Coach Lillie is steadily on the job and is rapidly rounding the boys into good form. There is plenty of material to choose from. Of the old boys who are back in line and who promise now to go even beyond the splendid record they made last year are Looney, Peers, S. Finley, W. Finley, Cooper, B. Isbell and G. Isbell. In the back field and in the line this group constitutes a fine nucleus around which to build a team. In addition to these are some new boys who are showing up remarkably well. Among these are Kirkland, who made such a fine showing for his team in the basket ball tournament last spring, Falkner, who made an enviable record in baseball, and Bird who though light, shows remarkable aptness for head work.

The first game of the season is only two weeks off; it will be played on Friday, October 3, with the Chilton County High School from Clanton. The following week the boys will go up against the strong team from Jefferson County High at Boyles. Negotiations are pending for other games and announcements will be made at an early date.

R. L. MERRELL GIVEN A 20 YEAR SENTENCE

R. L. Merrell of Calera, on trial last week in the circuit court for the murder of N. F. McElroy, was found guilty of murder in the second degree and sentenced to serve 20 years in the penitentiary.

Merrell's attorneys gave notice of an appeal to the supreme court and he will remain in jail at Columbiana until the case can be heard

The trial attracted wider interest than any that has been held in the Shelby courts in some time. It was begun on Thursday; the evidence was not concluded until Friday afternoon. On Saturday morning the arguments of the attorneys was heard and on Saturday afternoon the case was given to the jury. It required nearly three hours for the jury to reach a verdict.

The principal witness for the state was Reggie Lucas, who testified as at the preliminary trial, that on the night of McElroy's disappearance, as he, Merrell and McElroy were walking through the woods he heard two pistol shots and upon turning could not see McElroy, but saw Merrell holding a smoking pistol. Testifying in his his own defense Merrell swore that Lucas himself killed McElroy.

Attorneys for the defense were, L. H. Ellis, Longshore, Koenig & Longshore of Columbiana, and A. H. Carmichael of Tuscumbia. The state's interests were represented by Solicitors J. J. Haynes and P. O. Luck.

State Game Warden Was Here Tuesday

Ted Cottrell, of Birmingham, state game and fish warden, was in Shelby county the first of the week on business connected with his department. He stated that he found some violations of the state game and fish law in the county which he greatly regretted. He suggested that the Reporter remind hunters that the season for legal hunting is not open yet; the earliest date being for turtle doves, October 16th. The season for male deer, squirrels, ducks, geese and snipes opens November 1st. The season for quail does not open till November 20th and for wild turkey gobblers till December 1st.

Shrader's Gin Gives Good Service

There are but few plants, if any, in all the county that are better equipped for the work they are to do than Shrader's gin in Columbiana. Every device for handling cotton in the most convenient and approved way has been provided by Mr. Shrader and the four big gins of the most modern type are of adequate capacity for the needs of this territory.

Mr. Shrader has enjoyed a good patronage for his gin since it was established and is ready this season again to give the same good service the people have always had.

The Avondale Mills' seventy-five piece band, which will be heard every day; Scott's twenty-five car show and a large number of miscellaneous attractions.

Meeting Held at the Court House in Columbiana

A meeting that should be county wide in interest will be held in Columbiana at the court house on Thursday, October 30th, when Roland Turner General Agricultural Agent of the Southern Railway Development Service, will come to Columbiana to speak to the farmers and business men of Shelby county.

Mr. Turner is one of the most active and most effective agricultural workers in the whole South. His connection with the Southern Railway system, which he has held for a number of years, has enabled him to become familiar with farming conditions throughout the whole South, and has enabled him to study in minute detail conditions that have led to improved conditions in these communities and sections where real progress has been made.

Mr. Turner's services are in great demand and this is the third effort to get him to come to Shelby county in the past year. The invitation which he has accepted was extended to Mr. Turner through Mr. Lauderdale and Mr. Montgomery, local leaders in agricultural work, who are convinced that just at this time there is great need that the farmers and business men of Shelby county should hear, and from such a leader as Mr. Turner, how other sections of the South are finding the way to a greater agricultural prosperity than they have ever known, through the application of methods that have been tried, well proved and found to be adapted to the needs of modern farming.

MERCHANTS WHO FAIL ARE NOT ADVERTISERS

Richmond, Va.,—In all the failures of retail merchants during the last three years, not one "advertised religiously" says T. K. Kelly, Minneapolis banker, and business man, here in stressing the value of newspaper advertising to delegates attending the annual Southern Merchants Retail conference.

"The public," he asserted, "has unlimited confidence in newspaper advertising and the importance of this feature of modern business cannot be over estimated."

T. E. Warriner, of Lawrenceville, Va., president of the conference, expressed the opinion that business conditions throughout the country have recorded a distinct improvement; and in another part of his address, also emphasized the importance of newspaper advertising.

Retail merchants from Georgia, West Virginia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama and Virginia are in attendance.

The Opelika Rotary Club, at its luncheon recently, decided to establish another scholarship at Alabama Polytechnic Institute for this session and Miss Eleanor Kicker, a graduate of the Opelika High School, has been selected as the beneficiary. The club is already maintaining a one-year scholarship at Auburn and this action makes the second.

W. J. Buffington, former well known resident of Gadsden, has been surrendered by his bondsmen in a prohibition case, having been brought to Gadsden from Tuscaloosa. On his arrival he was served with two warrants, charging him with passing worthless checks, one at Birmingham and one in Newton County, Miss.

The Tuscumbia fish hatchery now has close to 200,000 minnows. Seventeen cans of fish have been received from the government hatcheries, including bass, rainbow trout, blue gills and croppies. Game Warden Dr. G. W. Brown has received notice that the sun fish he recently asked for will be shipped soon.

Mrs. Kate Stephenson, of Danville, was given a judgment in the circuit court at Decatur for $3,000 against Mrs. Euria Stephenson, her mother-in-law, in a suit alleging alienation of the affections of Mrs. Kate Stephenson's husband, a son of Mrs. Euria Stephenson.

The goal of 50,000 cars of tourists over the Chicago-Florida Highway the first year of operation will be reached in the opinion of A. B. Steward, one of the pathfinders for the route, who is at Albany logging the road southward from Nashville to Pensacola.

The Tuskegee Railroad Company has filed a petition with the Alabama Public Service Commission for authority to purchase from the Western Railway of Alabama a spur track running from Chehaw to the Veterans' Bureau Hospital, a distance of about 2.8 miles.

A new lumber company, capitalized at $20,000, is making preparations to establish a large planing mill and lumber yard on West Nineteenth Street, near Phillips and Stanley's warehouse, at Jasper.

Grizzly, with hair bobbed, toothless and bent, a woman of apparently 60 years, sits in a cell at the Dallas county jail at Selma, alternately smoking cigarettes and ranting at the officers who arrested her on a charge of vagrancy.

Morgan County Kiwanis Club members at a recent meeting discussed plans for aiding school children who need assistance to remain in school this year. Several reports were made on cases which are thought worthy and plans made to render such assistance.

In the proportion of counties of the state with fully organized county public health units, and in the percentage of people served by public health organizations, Alabama is second in the United States.

COATS FOR SCHOOL GIRLS; ONE-PIECE TAILORED FROCKS

YOUNG Miss America is once again spending most of her time in the pursuit of learning. Her pretty head is full of Latin declensions, higher mathematics, numerous ologies, how to keep her hair in curl and new autumn styles. In the subject of coats she shows much aptitude and she has already grasped the spirit of the mode in school clothes and approved what stylists prepared for her.

According to these stylists, the pursuit of knowledge ranks among foremost sports and the pursuers are therefore to be clad in sports clothes, or, at least, in semi-sports clothes. Coats reflect this cheerful attitude toward the business of getting an education—and schoolgirls have gleefully taken them on, showing very good judgment.

Cozy, Double-Breasted Model.

Polo cloth, camel's-hair, staple and novelty Scotch weaves, homespuns in swagger patterns, start the autumn school coat in the right direction. Many large plaids, cross bars and stripes challenge the skill of designers, who have taken up the challenge and shown just how well these assertive patterns can be managed. A fine example is shown in the picture, in a cozy, double-breasted model, warm and brimming over with good style which is able to defy all its kind to outclass it. Just to look at it brings to mind football games, college yells and breezy youngsters.

Hats, to be worn with these sports coats, are of the same casual but snappy style. Felt shapes and soft fabric hats lead in demand. All are very simple—the felt hats usually trimmed with strips of felt or with ribbon. Very simple embroidery, or stitching, like that shown in the picture is as well considered as any trimming.

When the pretty sub-deb is dressed to express her youth, she has a charm all her own—too often it is hid by clothes too old for her.

Here is one of those trim, one-piece frocks, faultlessly tailored, that have made a permanent place for themselves in every discerning woman's wardrobe. They have come to be an investment in dependability, like the tailored suit, and they share between them the main responsibility of our every-day dress.

With the vogue of the straight-line silhouette and its twin, simplicity, always hand in hand, it is amazing that there is no monotony to complain of in these interesting tailored frocks. Designers resort to so many fascinating tricks, to vary them—in cut, varied styles of front openings and sleeves, scarf attachments, decorations of buttons, braids, bands and embroideries, that each frock is a new short story. Tunics, necklines and plaitings add little thrills, by their clever management. In the frock pictured, a surplice front-opening promotes the cause of the convenient, wrap-around skirt, in delightfully original fashion, and the neat braid finish sets off the smart buttons on skirt and sleeves. The two pockets are important—an adornment as well as a necessity.

All of the substantial and handsome fabrics used for suits are represented in tailored dresses, and there are many plaids and checks among them. Novelty weaves are also among the rivals of plain woolens, and often two materials are used together. Designs are varied to suit the stout and the slim figure—godets and band trimmings or tunics, flaring sleeves and full collars or occasional cape attachments, serving to break the too-slim line. Many of the designs are cut as blouse and skirt and afterward joined. This makes opportunity for some fullness at the sides and very narrow belts or girdles often serve as decorative finis but just as often they are plain and made of the dress fabric. The one-piece tailored frock is particularly useful in autumn, when days are still too warm for a coat, but it is chiefly liked as a change from the tailored suit and for wear under heavy wraps in midwinter.

Lesson for September 28

REVIEW — OPENING PERIOD OF CHRIST'S MINISTRY

GOLDEN TEXT—For God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.—John 3:16.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Things to Remember About Jesus.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Early Events in Jesus' Life.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Lessons of Jesus' Childhood and Early Ministry.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Opening Period of Christ's Ministry.

Two methods of review are suggested:

I. Have the pupils go over the quarter's lessons and bring in reports which will picture Jesus as to His deity, pity, courage, devotion, etc. This should be assigned the week before and the reports should be written out clearly and distinctly and restricted to a certain number of minutes, according to the size of the class and time allotted for the review.

II. The Summary Method. This consists in a statement of the principal facts and leading lessons. The following suggestions are offered:

Lesson 1. That which Micah the prophet foretold some 700 years before and Gabriel announced to Mary and Joseph took place in Bethlehem and was made known to the shepherds. When the shepherds had investigated they went back praising the Lord and telling the good tidings to others. Those who hear the Gospel must tell it to others.

Lesson 2. Though Jesus Christ was the Son of God, therefore divine, and had taken upon Himself the human nature, which the Holy Ghost had created, He developed as a normal human being.

Lesson 3. While Jesus was absolutely sinless, He submitted to baptism, which is a sinner's ordinance, because He took the place of sinners. It was an act of dedication of Himself to the task of bringing in a righteousness which was accomplished on the cross of Calvary.

Lesson 4. Jesus was led into the wilderness by the Spirit to be tested by the power and subtlety of the devil in order to demonstrate the reality of the union of the human and divine natures—in order that man might have a real foundation upon which his faith might rest in order to be saved. Christ met and defeated Satan by the use of the Scriptures.

Lesson 5. When John the Baptist pointed out to his disciples the Lamb of God, they left him and followed Jesus. When they came to know Him as the Messiah, they brought others to Him. The natural thing for one to do who has found Christ is to bring others to Him for salvation.

Lesson 6. Marriage was ordained by God and the first wedding was sanctioned by His presence. Jesus Christ, who was hourly about His Father's business, set a mark of honor upon the mainspring of life by gracing this marriage feast with His presence. The Redeemer of man thus lifted the ordinance of marriage to its proper dignity and beauty. The design was to show the divine glory.

Lesson 7. When Jesus, the Lord of the temple, found it defiled, He drove out the money changers and the animals. To use the Lord's house as a place of merchandise is to pollute it. Because He was zealous for God He could not rest while God's house was misused.

Lesson 8. Though Nicodemus was a man of high station, a ruler among the Jews, even a religious teacher, he needed to be regenerated before he could see the Kingdom of God.

Lesson 9. Because Jesus' supreme business was to seek and to save the lost He "must needs go through Samaria" to save the immoral woman who came to Jacob's well.

Lesson 10. Sickness of the nobleman's son brought him to Jesus. Because the nobleman believed Jesus he had the joy of seeing his son alive.

Lesson 11. Jesus' habit was to go to God's house to worship. While in the synagogue He read and expounded the Scriptures. It was not only His custom to attend God's house, but to take part in the worship.

Lesson 12. Though Jesus was divine He needed the solitude for the renewal of His strength in communion with His Father.

HOW ARE YOUR CHILD'S TEETH?

YOU want your boy or girl to be attractive and healthy and to get good marks in school, don't you?

Many factors combine to bring about these results, but one often overlooked is the condition of the child's teeth.

The bones of a child are soft and pliable and the habit of sucking the thumb, which many mothers permit to go unchecked, may cause a deformity of the mouth which will spoil the appearance for life. The thumb-sucking habit forces the jaw bones out of place, with the result that the upper front teeth are pushed outward and the lower ones backward until the entire face is deformed.

Usually, however, the "baby" teeth are straight and pretty. They are small and the jaws are large enough for them. It is the second teeth that commonly are not right. If they come in crooked, it is generally because the jaws are not large enough to accommodate them. Sometimes the jaws are stunted because they have not had enough exercise in chewing solid food. Or the jaw development may have been retarded because the child was poorly nourished. If the general development of the child is not good the jaw and tooth development is likely to be poor and if the jaw bones are not sufficiently developed, the teeth will be crowded out of the normal position so that the upper and lower teeth do not meet in order to bite and chew properly. The inability to chew the food thoroughly will result in indigestion and the crooked, crowded teeth give the child an unattractive appearance which may be as great as to be a positive deformity. How many children have you seen who would have been pretty but for teeth that were crooked or that protruded or that were decayed?

In these days of keen competition in every line of effort, each individual needs every advantage and equipment in the way of ability and appearance in order to hold his own and make his way in the world. It is a crime to allow a child to grow up with a physical handicap that can be corrected. The handicap of bad teeth and deformed face can, in most cases, be overcome.

See that your child makes regular visits to the dentist and see that his instructions are obeyed. Don't make it possible for your child when grown to blame you for an unattractive face, for poor school or business records, for poor health, if these defects could be the results of a condition so easily remedied as bad teeth.

WATCH THE CHILDREN'S SHOES AND FEET

THE foot, like all other parts of the human body, is beautiful in its natural state. In its unspoiled beauty it is seen in young children and in members of the few tribes and races which still go barefoot or wear only sandals to protect the feet. The natural foot is the one seen in the masterpieces of the painter and the sculptor. It is as beautiful as the hand and as expressive of personality.

The normal human foot is triangular in outline, with the point of the triangle at the heel. The toes are slightly separated and the bones of the foot are so constructed that they form a natural arch for supporting the body. The ball of the foot, which is intended to bear the body-weight, is covered with an extra thick layer of skin. There are also the back part of the heel and the under portions of the toes, which grasp the ground in walking.

The average human foot, however, bears little resemblance to the normal foot. The toes are cramped, overlapped and bent; bunions distort the joints; corns grow on the toes; the skin are thickened, ingrown or bent under the ends of the toes; calluses develop ure various parts of the foot; broken arches add "flat foot" to the other deformities.

We pity the Chinese women for their bound "lily feet," but we extend no sympathy to the American girl with her crippled, disabled feet on which she hobbles about in shop, factory, office or kitchen. The Chinese do not expect the possessor of "lily feet" to do any work or much walking but we demand that our women retain their places in business and industrial life in spite of the physical disability of crippled feet.

Modern shoes with their high heels and pointed toes are responsible for this universal foot deformity. Such shoes prevent the spread and support of the arch and ball of the foot which are naturally a part of every foot. The muscles governing this spread and spring, from lack of use, become shrunken and lose their strength. The shrinking of the muscles of the foot gradually extends to the muscles of the ankles, the calves of the legs, the knees and the thighs, often affecting the muscles of the lower part of the trunk. The discomfort felt when walking in tennis shoes or very low-heeled shoes is due to the fact that long-idle active muscles are called into service. Pains in the knees and thighs, which the sufferer believes is "rheumatism," are often caused by "flat foot" or broken arches.

ZEN of the Y. D.

"SAY YES NOW!"

SYNOPSIS.—Transley's hay-cutting outfit, after stacking 2,000 tons, is on its way to the big Y.D. ranch headquarters. Transley is a master of men and circumstances. Linder, foreman, is substantial, but not self-assertive. George Drazk one of the men, is an irresponsible chap who proposes to every woman he meets. Transley and Linder dine with Y.D. and his wife and daughter Zen. Transley resolves to marry Zen. Y.D. instructs Transley to cut the South Y.D., "spite o' h—l an' high water" and a fellow named Landson. Drazk proposes to Zen and is neatly repuffed. Transley pitches camp on the South Y.D. and finds Landson's outfit cutting hay. Dennison Grant, Landson's manager, notifies Transley that he is working under a lease from the legal owners and warns Transley off. All of which means war. Y.D. and Zen ride to the South Y.D. Zen is a natural vamp, not yet halter-broke and ripe for mating. Y.D. has taken a liking to Transley. Zen holds Transley off and encourages Linder. Zen enjoys the prospect of a race between Transley and Linder for her favor, but secretly laughs at both. She has another and more serious encounter with Drazk. Y.D. mowing machines are ruined by iron stakes set in the grass. Zen prevents open war with Landson. Transley half-way proposes and is turned off. Drazk sets a fire that attacks the Landson stacks. The Y.D. outfit hastens to aid the enemy. Zen rides off alone to help. The wind changes and the Y.D. people now have to fight the prairie fire. Zen rides into the river to escape flames. Drazk tries to abduct her. She drowns him—or thinks she has. Grant overtakes her. In trying to ride through fire Zen is thrown and knocked senseless. Zen comes to after several hours of unconsciousness to find herself in the dark with Grant. She has a sprained ankle and both horses have run away. So she and Grant sit on a rock and tell their past lives. Grant, it appears, is a rich man's son who scorns wealth in order to live his own life. Y.D. and his men arrive after daylight. Naturally, in the circumstances, haying is abandoned. Grant rides off. Transley goes to the nearest town.

Up to this time Transley had not thought seriously of matrimony. A wife and children he regarded as desirable appendages for declining years and for the quiet and shade of that evening toward which every active man looks with such irrational confidence. But for the heat of the day—for the climb up the hill—they would be unnecessary encumbrances. Transley always took a practical view of these matters. It need hardly be stated that he had never been in love; in fact, Transley would have scouted the idea of any passion which would throw the practical to the winds. That was a thing for weaklings, and, possibly, for women.

But his attachment for Zen was a very practical matter. Zen was the only heir to the Y.D. wealth. She could bring to her husband capital and credit which Transley could use to good advantage in his business. She could also bring personality—a delightful individuality—of which any man might be proud. She had that rare combination of attractions which expressed in the word charm. She had health, constitution, beauty. She had courage and sympathy. She had qualities of leadership. She would bring to him not only the material means to build a house, but the spiritual qualities which make a home. She would make him the envy of all acquaintances. And a jealous man was to be envied.

So after the work on the excavations had been properly started Transley turned over the detail to the able dependable Linder, and, remarking that he had not had a final settlement with Y.D., set out for the ranch in the foothills. While spending the golden autumn day alone in the buggy he was able to turn over and develop plans on an even more ambitious scale that had occurred to him amid the bustle of his men and horses.

The valley was lying very warm and beautiful in yellow light, and the setting sun was just capping the mountains with gold and painting great splashes of copper and bronze on the few clouds becalmed in the heavens, when Transley's tired team plodded in among the cluster of buildings known as the Y.D. The rancher met him at the bunk-house. He greeted Transley with a firm grip of great palm, and with jaws open in suggestion of a sort of carnivorous hospitality.

"Come up to the house, Transley," he said, turning the horses over to the attention of a ranch hand. "Supper is just ready, an' the women will be glad to see you."

Zen, walking with a limp, met them at the gate. Transley's eyes reassured him that he had not been led astray by any process of idealization; Zen in all his mind had been picturing her. She was worth the effort. Indeed a strange sensation of tenderness suffused him as he walked by her side to the door, supporting her little with his hand. There they were ushered in by the rancher's wife, while Zen herself showed Transley to the room where were white towels and water from the river and quiet and restful furnishings. Transley congratulated himself that he could hardly hope to be better received.

After supper he had a social drink with Y.D., and then the two sat on the veranda and smoked and discussed business. Transley found Y.D. more liberal in the adjustment than he had expected. He had not yet realized to what an extent he had won the old rancher's confidence, and Y.D. was a man who, when his confidence had been won, never haggled over details. He was willing to compromise the loss on the operations on the South Y.D. on a scale that was not merely just, but generous.

This settled, Transley proceeded to interest Y.D. in the work in which he was now engaged. He drew a picture of activities in the little metropolis such as stirred the rancher's incredulity.

"Well, well," Y.D. would say. "Transley, I've known that little hole for about thirty years, an' never seen it was any good excep' to get drunk in. . . . I've seen more things there than is down in the books."

"You wouldn't know the change that has come about in a few months," said Transley, with enthusiasm. "Double shifts working by electric light, Y.D.! What do you think of that? Men with rolls of money that would choke a cow sleeping out in tents because they can't get a roof over them. Why, man, I didn't have to hunt a job there; the job hunted me. I could have had a dozen jobs at my own price if I could have handled them. It's just as if prosperity was a river which had been trickling through that town for thirty years, and all of a sudden the dam up in the foothills gives away and down she comes with a rush. Lots which sold a year ago for a hundred dollars are selling now for five hundred—sometimes more. Old ranchers living on the bald-headed a few years ago find themselves today the owners of city property worth millions, and are dressing uncomfortably, in keeping with their wealth, or vainly trying to drink up the surplus. So far sense and brains has had nothing to do with it, Y.D., absolutely nothing. It has been fool luck. But the brains are coming in now, and the brains will get the money, in the long run."

Transley paused and lit another cigar. Y.D. rolled his in his lips, reflectively.

"I mind some doin's in that burg," he said, as though the memory of them was of greater importance than all that might be happening now.

Transley switched back to business. "We ought to be in on it, Y.D.," he said. "Not on the fly-by-night stuff; I don't mean that. But I could take twice the contracts if I had twice the outfit."

Y.D. brought his chair down on to all four legs and removed his cigar.

"You mean we should hit her together?" he demanded.

"It would be a great compliment to me, if you had that confidence in me, and I'm sure it would make some good money for you."

"How'd you work it?"

"You have a bunch of horses running here on the ranch, eating their heads off. Many of them are broke, and the others would soon tame down with a scraper behind them. Let me put them to work. I'd have to have equipment, too. Your name on the back of my note would get it, and you wouldn't actually have to put up a dollar. Then we'd make an inventory of what you put into the firm and what I put into it, and we'd divide the earnings in proportion."

"After payin' you a salary as manager, of course," suggested Y.D.

"That's immaterial. With a bigger outfit and more capital I can make so much more money out of the earnings that I don't care whether I get a salary or not. But I wouldn't figure on going on contracting all the time for other people. We might as well have the cream as the skimmed milk. This is the way it's done. We go to the owner of a block of lots somewhere where there's no building going on. He's anxious to start something, because as soon as building starts in that district the lots will sell for two or three times what they do now. We say to him, 'Give us every second lot in your block and we'll put a house on it.' In this way we get the lots for a trifle; perhaps for nothing. Then we build a lot of houses, more or less to the same plan. We put 'em up quick and cheap. We build 'em to sell, not to live in. Then we mortgage 'em for the last cent we can get. Then we put the price up to twice what the mortgage is and sell them as fast as we can build them, getting our equity out and leaving the purchasers to settle with the mortgage company. It's good for from 30 to 40 per cent profit, not per annum, but per transaction."

"It sounds interesting," said Y.D., "an' I suppose I might as well put my spare horses an' credit to work. I don't mind drivin' down with you tomorrow an' looking her over first hand."

This was all Transley had hoped for, and the talk turned to less material matters. After a while Zen joined them, and a little later Y.D. left to attend to some business at the bunk-house.

"Your father and I may go into partnership, Zen," Transley said to her, when they were alone together. He explained in a general way the venture that was afoot.

"That will be very interesting," she agreed.

"Will you be interested?"

"Of course. I am interested in everything that Dad undertakes."

"And are you not—will you not be—just a little interested in the things that I undertake?"

She paused a moment before replying. The dusk had settled about them, and he could not see the contour of her face, but he knew that she had realized the significance of his question.

"Why yes," she said at length. "I will be interested in what you undertake. You will be Dad's partner."

Her evasion nettled him.

"Zen," he said, "why shouldn't we understand each other?"

"Don't we?" She had turned slightly toward him, and he could feel the laughing mockery in her eyes.

"I rather think we do," he answered, "only we—at least, you—won't admit it."

"Oh!"

"Seriously, Zen, do you imagine I came over here today simply to make a deal with your father?"

"Wasn't that worth while?"

"Of course it was. But it wasn't the whole purpose—it wasn't half the purpose. I wanted to see Y.D., it is true, but more, very much more, I wanted to see you."

She did not answer, and he could only guess what was the trend of her thoughts. After a silence he continued:

"You may think I am precipitate. You intimated as much to me once. I am. I know of no reason why an honest man should go beating about the bush. When I want something I want it, and I make a bee-line for it. If it is a contract—if it is a business matter—I go right after it, with all the energy that's in me. When I'm looking for a contract I don't start by talking about the weather. Well—this is my first experience in love, and perhaps my methods are all wrong, but it seems to me they should apply. At any rate a girl of your intelligence will understand."

"Applying your business principles," she interrupted, "I suppose if you wanted a wife and there was none in sight you would advertise for her?"

He defended his position. "I don't see why not," he declared. "I can't understand the general attitude of levity toward matrimonial advertisements. Apparently they are too open and above-board. Matrimony should not be committed in a round-about, indirect, hit-or-miss manner. A young man sees a girl whom he thinks he would like to marry. Does he go to her house and say, 'Miss So-and-So, I think I would like to marry you. Will you allow me to call on you so that we may get better acquainted, with that object in view?' He does not. Such honesty would be considered almost brutal. He calls on her and pretends he would like to take her to the theater, if it is in town, or for a ride, if it is in the country. She pretends she would like to go. Both of them know what the real purpose is, and both of them pretend they don't. They start the farce by pretending a deceit which deceives nobody. They wait for nature to set up an attraction which shall overrule their judgment, rather than act by judgment first and leave it to nature to take care of herself. How much better it would be to be perfectly frank—to boldly announce the purpose—to come as I now come to you and say, 'Zen, I want to marry you. My reason, my judgment, tells me that you would be an ideal mate. I shall be proud of you, and I will try to make you proud of me. I will gratify your desires in every way that my means will permit. I pledge you my fidelity in return for yours. I—I—Zen, will you say yes? Can you believe that there is in my simple words more sincerity than there could be in any mad ravings about love? You are young, Zen, younger than I, but you must have observed some things. One of them is that marriage, founded on mutual respect, which increases with the years, is a much safer and wiser business than marriage founded on a passion which quickly burns itself out and leaves the victims cold, unresponsive, with nothing in common. You may not feel that you know me well enough for a decision. I will give you every opportunity to know me better—I will do nothing to deceive you—I will put on no veneer—I will let you know me as I really am. Will you say yes?"

"I Don't See Why Not," He Declared.

He had left his seat and approached her; he was leaning close over her chair. While his words had suggested marriage on a purely intellectual basis he did not hesitate to bring his physical presence into the scale. He was accustomed to having his way—he had always had it—never did he want it more than he did now. . . . And although he had made his plea from the intellectual angle he was sure, he was very, very sure there was more than that. This girl, whose very presence delighted him—intoxicated him—would have made him mad—

"Will you say yes?" he repeated, and his hands found hers and drew her with his great strength up from her chair. She did not resist, but when she was on her feet she avoided his embrace.

"You must not hurry me," she whispered. "I must have time to think. I did not realize what you were saying until—"

"Say yes now," he urged. Transley was a man very hard to resist. She felt as though she were in the grip of a powerful machine; it was as though she were being swept along by a stream against which her feeble strength was as nothing. Zen was as nearly frightened as she ever had been in her vigorous young life. And yet there was something delightful. It would have been so easy to surrender—it was so hard to resist.

"Say yes now," he repeated, drawing her close at last and breathing the question into her ear. "You shall have time to think—you shall ask your own heart, and if it does not confirm your words you will be released from your promise."

They heard the footsteps of her father approaching, and Transley waited no longer for an answer. He turned her face to his; he pressed his lips against hers.

CHAPTER VIII

Zen thought over the events of that evening until they became a blur in her memory. Her principal recollection was that she had been quite swept off her feet. Transley had interpreted her submission as assent, and she had not corrected him in the vital moment when they stood before her father that night in the deep shadow of the veranda.

"Y.D.," Transley had said, "your consent and your blessing! Zen and I are to be married as soon as she can be ready."

That was the moment at which she should have spoken, but she did not. She, who had prided herself that she would make a race of it—she, who had always been able to slip out of a predicament in the nick of time—stood mutely by and let Transley and her father interpret her silence as consent. She was not sure that she was sorry; she was not sure but she would have consented anyway; but Transley had taken the matter quite out of her hands. And yet she could not bring herself to feel resentment toward him; that was the strangest part of it. It seemed that she had come under his domination; that she even had to think as he would have her think.

In the darkness she could not see her father's face, for which she was sorry; and he could not see hers, for which she was glad. There was a long moment of tense silence before she heard him say:

"Well, well! I had a hunch it might come to that, but I didn't reckon you youngsters would work so fast."

"This was a stake worth working fast for," Transley was saying, as he shook Y.D.'s hand. "I wouldn't trade places with any man alive." And Zen was sure he meant exactly what he said.

"She's a good girl, Transley," her father commented; "a good girl, even if a bit obstrep'rous at times. She's got spirit, Transley, an' you'll have to handle her with sense. She's a—a thoroughbred!"

Y.D. had reached his arms toward his daughter, and at these words he closed them about her. Zen had never known her father to be emotional; she had known him to face matters of life and death without the quiver of an eyelid, but as he held her there in his arms that night she felt his big frame tremble. Suddenly she had a powerful desire to cry. She broke from his embrace and ran upstairs to her room.

Zen, though she has let silence give consent, is busy thinking of Grant. Will she make up her mind to speak out?

Birds Sing Again in Ancient Pompeii Garden

In the last days of Pompeii a picturesque garden with marble mountains and frescoed niches was one of the adornments of the city.

One entered through a carriage pavilion, the high entrance surmounted by a bell. Across the threshold a court in white and gold between two rows of pillars led to the spacious, sloping terraces, watered by a drowsy brook. The twitter of a thousand birds completed the pastoral landscape.

Excavators have resurrected this garden. The lawns are green again, as they were when Vesuvius erupted, A. D. 79. A silvery bell again peals for visitors; the murmuring brook wanders in through new conduits, and songsters, descendants of the birds who were singing about Pompeii more than 1,800 years ago, carol as their forbears did in the days made famous by Bulwer-Lytton.

WEEKLY MENU SUGGESTIONS

During the last days of summer and early autumn, food that is easy of digestion and not too substantial, is most favored.

SUNDAY—Breakfast: Grapefruit with cherries. Dinner: Fried chicken, green peas, ice cream. Supper: Egg lemonade, lettuce and cucumber sandwiches.

MONDAY—Breakfast: Blackberries, oatmeal with top milk. Dinner: Broiled steak, parsley, potatoes, cherry pie. Supper: Fresh mushrooms on toast.

TUESDAY—Breakfast: Iced cantaloupe. Dinner: Lamb cutlets with currant jelly. Supper: Sandwiches, tea, chicken salad.

WEDNESDAY—Breakfast: Toast and poached egg. Dinner: Baked ham, sliced tomatoes. Supper: Cottage cheese with cream, currant jelly.

FRIDAY—Breakfast: Peaches, hominy and milk. Dinner: Baked stuffed fish, creamed onions. Supper: Scrambled eggs, toast points.

SATURDAY—Breakfast: Corn flakes, cream. Dinner: Baked hash, lettuce salad. Supper: Cream cake, blueberries.

Fresh Mushrooms on Toast.

Take the freshly gathered field mushrooms, remove the stems and peel the caps. Cut up stems and caps and cook five minutes in a tablespoonful of butter to each cupful of mushrooms. Add one-half cupful of thin cream and serve poured over buttered toast.

Chicken Salad.

Take bits of leftover cooked chicken, add an equal amount or one and one-half times as much minced celery. Mix with a good well seasoned salad dressing and serve on lettuce.

Chicken With Oysters.—Prepare and disjoint a nice fat chicken, put it into a saucepan, cover with water, season highly with salt and pepper and stew until it begins to get tender. Line the sides of a deep baking dish with a good biscuit crust. Remove the bones from the largest pieces and place the meat in pieces of butter, repeat with another layer of chicken. Pour in half the broth from the chicken and some oyster liquor, with a top layer of oysters. Cover with the top crust and bake, leaving a vent for the steam to escape.

Don't worry when you stumble. Remember a worm is about the only thing that can't fall down. 'Tis looking down that makes one dizzy.—Browning.

GOOD THINGS FOR THE TABLE

These are the busy days for the thrifty housewife who has fruit and vegetables in her garden to can. For variety—and we all enjoy something different, try—

Quince and Cranberry Jam.—Wash five quinces, cut them into pieces without peeling, add one quart of cranberries and cook until the quinces are soft. Rub through a sieve, measure, add three-fourths as much sugar and cook until thick, stirring often. Pour into sterilized glasses.

Quince Honey.—Pare and grate five large quinces. Put five pounds of sugar and one pint of water into a saucepan, stir until the sugar is dissolved, add the quinces and cook fifteen to twenty minutes, taking care not to scorch. It should be about the color and consistency of honey. Pour into sterilized glasses and seal when cold.

Pepper Relish.—Take six red peppers, six green ones, and six onions; remove the seeds from the peppers and put onion and peppers through a meat chopper. Cover th chopped mixture with boiling water and let stand five minutes. Drain and add one cupful of sugar, two tablespoonfuls of salt, one and one-half cupfuls of vinegar, and boil twenty minutes. If not moist enough add one-half cupful of water. Sea. in jars.

Turnip Croquettes.—Cook young, tender turnips until done, drain and mash. To each pint add a meaty, white mashed potato, the beaten yolk of an egg, one-half teaspoonful of sugar, two tablespoonfuls of butter, salt and pepper to taste. Form into croquettes, dip into fine crumbs, then into egg beaten with two tablespoonfuls of water, then into crumbs and fry in deep fat.

Ritz Tomatoes.—Cut rounds of toast, butter, lay in a shallow pan and lay on each a thin slice of cheese. On the cheese lay half of a tomato, cut-side up, sprinkle with sugar, salt, pepper and finely minced green pepper and onion. Put a slice of butter on each, grated cheese over, and set in a hot oven until the tomatoes are slightly browned. Top with a sprig of parsley and garnish with crisp bacon.

Orange Jelly.—Prepare a pint of orange jelly and set in a pan of ice water. When it begins to thicken begin to beat with an egg beater until light and foamy. Put into sherbet glasses and garnish with a mint cherry. Serve cold.

Man Who Buys No Better Than Bootlegger.—

The bootlegger and the man who buys from the bootlegger are in the same class of bad citizenship, Mrs. Mabel Willebrandt, assistant attorney general of the United States, decired in an address last week. No man who is willing to purchase the merchandise of lawlessness, can be considered within the law, she said and every man who is a good citizen will be willing to be bound by the law and obey it whether he likes a particular law or not.

"The prohibition front is the real political battle front of the nation today," Mrs. Willebrandt declared, and she said that even those who wish to have the prohibition laws repealed, must give their earnest support to the Volstead law so long as it is operative, if they wish to have any legitimate claim to good citizenship.

Jury Couldn't Agree

A strange situation was developed in the circuit court of Houston county in session at Dotnan, recently.

A man charged with violating the prohibition laws was on trial and he entered a plea of guilty. Without making this fact known, the judge submitted the case to a jury, "to see what the jury would do," he said. After remaining out for 12 hours the jury reported that it could not agree on a verdict.

Then the judge told the members of the jury that the man on trial had already plead guilty and he told them more than that. "How any 12 men with reason and due respect for their citizenship and oath could have failed to reach a verdict of guilty in this case is beyond my comprehension" he said. Other influences than testimony, has governed the action of some of you," the judge added.

In Behalf of the Widow Murphy and Her Children

May we bear one another's burdens and so fulfill the law of Christ. May we imitate our Saviour's example as he went about doing good.

So let each and every citizen of Shelby county put on the whole armor of God and fight with dollars and cents to obtain relief for the fatherless and the widow at our door who were bereft of father and husband in cold blooded murder in July 1923, and left with a burden of debt; a mortgage on all they possess which with accumulated interest amounts to $118; $200 for groceries and other necessities of life; and besides they have to pay one-fourth of their crop for rent.

Nothing will be left to maintain them and the winter season approaches. Let us open our hearts and our purses in response to the need of these good and worthy people. I enclose my check for $10 as a token of love and duty. Let all who can do so send their checks to the Reporter and let us unite in giving jointly with Christ.

Yours very sincerely,
Mrs. Mary V. Northrup.

Note:—The Reporter will be glad to receive and acknowledge any amounts that may be sent in response to Mrs. Northrup's appeal and deliver them to Mrs. Murphy.

SCHOOL AT ARAB HAS A SPLENDID RECORD

A short time ago the Reporter called attention to the work of the people of Arab community in Marshall county in building a school. Recently the Age-Herald had an editorial in which the results obtained by this remarkable school were discussed. The Age-Herald says:

A highly encouraging record was made by the vocational agricultural school at Arab, Alabama, on Brindlee Mountain, which illustrates the practical value of such schools when conducted along the right lines. The school turned in a net profit of four thousand dollars from the efforts of the students in the all-day classes and the farmers who attended the evening classes under the supervision of the teacher during the first year ending June 30. It is expected to do equally as well or better in the future. It is said that the investment of the Marshall county board of education at Arab, co-operating with the state and federal authorities, paid the largest dividends of any school in the county, or probably in the state. The profits of the students were double the salary of the teacher. Projects were undertaken by the boys in field and garden crops, while farmers cultivated larger acreages. All were required to keep accurate records of their work and expenses.

"Aside from the direct profits received from the operation of this school, the returns from the training and experimental benefits were much more valuable. The scientific knowledge imparted to young and old alike will bear fruit in years to come. In addition to directing improved methods of modern farming operations, the vocational teacher at Arab terraced more than one thousand acres of land for more than twenty-five farmers, treated many sick animals, conducted a community fair gave advice on many farming problems and induced fifty per cent of the farmers of that community to mix their own fertilizers by means of which thousands of dollars were saved.

Readers of this article will please remember that Arab is a village, twenty miles from the railroad that in 1920 had a population of 264.

NEW AGRICULTURAL ERA FORECAST

Montgomery, Ala.—(Special)—What agricultural economists regard as the possible beginning of a new era in Southern farming was inaugurated recently when the converted steam plant owned by the Alabama Power Company and dedicated by them to the cause of boll weevil control began production of calcium arsenate according to the newly discovered process of electrolytic precipitation. Officials of the Gulf States Chemical & Refining Company, operators of the plant, expressed themselves as delighted with the first day's production of three tons which, according to J. A. Moore, President of the Company, is sufficient to exterminate or control the boll weevil on 1,200 acres of cotton. "The first day's production," said Mr. Moore "is but a fraction of the daily capacity which will be delivered when the plant is under full operating control and manufacturing processes become synchronized."

The manufactured product is said to equal in every way that prepared by the inventors using laboratory methods and is of such purity that it may be used not only as a boll weevil destroyer but on fruit trees, in gardens and on other plants which formerly required lead arsenate, a more expensive insecticide but one less harsh than calcium arsenate produced by former methods.

The electrolytic process was discovered two years ago by A. M. Kennedy, at that time a member of the engineering staff of the Alabama Power Company and a former close associate of Thomas A. Edison in chemical work. Mr. Kennedy became impressed with the need of an adequate supply of a poison which would facilitate boll weevil extermination or control. Calcium arsenate, is considered to be the only effective poison yet discovered for the South's cotton scourge, but its manufacture by acid methods was cumbersome and the resulting product was not uniform and frequently contained traces of free acid which burned the plants. Mr. Kennedy had spent the greater portion of his life in the study of electrochemistry and conceived the idea of producing calcium arsenate by electrolysis to yield a product free from harmful ingredients and of specific composition. He acquainted officials of the Alabama Power Company with his ideas and received their enthusiastic support, President Thomas W. Martin placing at his disposal all necessary resources for carrying out the work.

Mr. Kennedy perfected the principles of his process, later enlisting the aid of Dr. Stewart J. Loyd, head of the Department of Chemistry at the University of Alabama, who assisted him in making his ideas practicable. Numerous experiments were performed in the State, and later the Power Company secured the cooperation of the General Electric Company who extended to the inventors the facilities of their laboratories at Schenectady where the Kennedy-Loyd process, as it is now known, was perfected.

Realizing the immediate need for tremendously increased production of calcium arsenate in the South, and wishing to place a superior product at once in the hands of the farmers, the inventors, through the influence of Power Company officials, enlisted the aid of J. A. Moore, Jr., President of the Gulf States Chemical and Refining Company who agreed to bring about practical application of their discovery.

Immediate action was necessary to bring out the new product in sufficient quantity to combat the boll weevil during the season of 1924, and realizing the futility of attempting to construct a new plant in time to produce the poison during this year, Mr. Moore some months ago appealed to the Power Company who placed at the disposal of his concern, free of charge for a period of years, a steam plant with full equipment which had been acquired by the Alabama Power Company at the time the Montgomery utilities were taken over. Then followed a period of feverish work in which forces of the Power Company joined hands with those of the Chemical concern in the task of converting the plant from a power producer to a boll-weevil death-mill. Conversion was completed recently and the smoothness of performance in producing today's output is ample evidence of the thoroughness of the transformation.

J. A. Moore, President of the Gulf States Company, explained that it is the purpose of his Company to develop further the production of calcium arsenate and other arsenical insecticides through their research department in such manner that production costs can be materially lowered, all of which will react to the ultimate good of the Southern farmer and orchardist. "The location of this plant in Montgomery" said Mr. Moore "assures Southern cotton growers of a source for immediate supply of practically any quantity of calcium arsenate they may wish. Shipping facilities are good as the Gulf States Chemical and Refining Company's plant is served by several roads. Distribution has commenced, and there are enough orders already on hand to keep the plant operating full capacity for several weeks ahead."

A. M. Kennedy, inventor of the process paid high tribute to the Alabama Power Company who, he said, by providing facilities for perfecting the process and in donating the use of the factory and equipment have given to the South its greatest asset in controlling the boll weevil.

John F. Allen Writes About Our Road Law

Once upon a time a community of people found themselves without a school house. Now everybody thinks his children are better than other people's, but these people knew their children were the best in the whole world. So they set to work to build a beautiful school house, painted it and polished the floors. Then they employed the best teacher they could find and sent their children to school.

But, alas, on the way to school it rained for 20 minutes and the children all ran for shelter until rain stopped. Then they hurried on to school. But the teacher met them at the door and sent them all home, "We cannot afford," she said, "To soil and scratch and muddy this nice new school building."

A year and a half ago our people voted a bond issue so as to release our road and bridge tax from the United States court. Then the Legislature came to our assistance by taxing gasoline 2 cents a gallon. Then our Board of Revenue very wisely collected road tax from all who were subject to road duty that would pay. They then bought machinery (good too) hired competent men to operate it and began grading our roads. Too much cannot be said in praise of the Board of Revenue's good judgement and energy and the faithfulness of the men operating the machinery. Never in the history of Shelby county has there been so much road work done in the county. Our Board of Revenue are honest, faithful and efficient yet they are human.

So with a mistaken idea that they could protect the roads thereby, they forbade any heavy traffic in 24 or 36 hours after a rain, according to the time of year. They also forbade anyone stacking lumber, piling logs or cordwood along the public road and loading it on a vehicle in the road.

Now I think this law ought to be repealed or amended for the following reasons:

First, who will keep time on the rain? It may rain 20 minutes here and not rain any a mile from here. It may rain enough in 20 minutes to fill the ditches, move the bridges and overflow the road or it may rain 20 minutes and just lay the dust.

Second, Under this law it will do but very little good to stop the heavy, slow moving vehicle and allow the touring or detouring car to run. It is the swift moving vehicle that picks up the mud and slings it out of the road, making ruts to catch the water when it rains, again cutting it deeper each time the car speeds by.

Third, It is arbitrary and unfair and defeats its own purpose. Let us see. You load your vehicle and start. In 20 minutes rain falls, while you are enroute. You can't go on; you can't unload, if you do you break the law. When it dries off and you come back and reload suppose you drive a ton truck. you pay twice as much tag tax as the man who drives a Ford car, yet he can go with 799 pounds any time, any where, if you take 801 lbs. you are subject to arrest and fine.

This law will paralyze our chief tax paying industries. Coal mines must have timbers, lime kilns must have wood; oil trucks, Coca Cola trucks, fire-wood and coal wagons are bound to go or someone will suffer. The farmer utilizes the wet times to haul his cotton to the gin or his produce to the market. What are you going to do about it? you say. Why ask the Board of Revenue to repeal this law. If you don't see them, write to them. Address Board of Revenue, Columbiana, Ala. Send them so many letters that it will cover Oliver Miles up and when he scratches out and secs what a task it will be to read them all he will say, "Gentlemen, the people seem to want this law repealed." ...ational Park Visitors Rival Nature's Wonders

...llowing are some of the human ...ctions of the Yellowstone park as described by Harry Owen Frazier in the Saturday Evening Post.

Women in high-heeled shoes, silk stockings and khaki breeches, hiking among the geysers and along the trails.

Men in low shoes, palm beach trousers, heavy sweaters and straw hats, doing the same thing.

Men, women and children crowding around the camp dining room half an hour before mealtime for fear they would not be the first served.

The talkative lady who was forever evading to change her routing so she would be with new-found friends.

The man who ran to the cone of Old Faithful to see her spout and was treated to a nice hot shower.

The many who put their hands into the hot springs to see if the water was actually hot—and found out.

The lady who asked if the springs froze over in winter.

The roughneck who told her they did and that once a man broke through the ice and scalded his feet.

The schoolma'am with notebook and pensive look who will go home and write a description of the Grand canyon.

The man who put his collar into the Handkerchief pool and expected it to come out starched and ironed.

The man who exchanged dessert with his neighbor at table, before the neighbor arrived, because of a slight difference in cross-sectional area in favor of the absent one.

The lady who got close enough to a bear to take a snapshot and then discovered that her camera needed reloading.

An obliging bear who sat upon a stump until the nerve-racking task was finished.

The pest who growled at the service at the camps, but would not change to the hotels.

Thackeray Ate Fourteen Items on Dinner Menu

Thackeray was proud of his achievements as an eater, and in "Roadside Sketches" set forth the bill of fare of a little dinner he once enjoyed at Antwerp: "1, green pea soup; 2, boiled salmon; 3, mussels; 4, crimped skate; 5, roast meat; 6, patties; 7, melon; 8, stewed carp with mushrooms and onions; 9, roast turkey; 10, cauliflower and butter; 11, fillets of venison piques with assafoetida sauce; 12, stewed calf's ear; 13, roast veal; 14, roast lamb; 15, stewed cherries; 16, rice pudding; 17, Gruyere cheese and about twenty-four cakes of different kinds."

"Except 5, 13 and 14," he declared, "I give you my word I ate all written down here, with three rolls and a score of potatoes."

Hawaiian Geysers

Two enormous geysers are spouting 2,000,000 cubic feet of molten lava every hour from the Kilauea volcano. During the past summer the crater of this volcano, which is 2,000 feet wide and contains an immense lake of liquid fire, has been draining, due ta subterranean disturbances, the surface of the lake having dropped 600 feet below the rim in August. In September the crater began to rise again at a rapid rate until it had reached within 200 feet of the rim. The appearance of two immense geysers spouting molten lava high into the air and dropping it back into the lake is an unsual phenomenon in the occasional rise and fall of the liquid fire of the Kilauea crater.—Department of Interior Bulletin.

Speed Ordinance of 1757

The quaintness of Boston's Colonial days as it seems to us now lives and breathes in the words of a regulation adopted by the selectmen of 1757. Those city fathers declared that owing to "great danger arising oftentimes from coaches, slays, chairs, and other carriages, on the Lord's days, as people are going to or coming from the several churches in this town, being driven with great rapidity, and the public worship being oftentimes much disturbed by such carriages, it is therefore voted and ordered, that no coach, slay, chair, chaise or other carriage shall at such times be driven at a greater rate than a foot pace, on penalty to the master of the slave or servant so driving of the sum of ten shillings."—Boston Transcript.

The following is a story told by H. J. Byron and retold by Harry Furniss, of a costermonger who thought he would enjoy his holiday taking a walk through the West End. "Yes, Mr. Byron, I dress myself up stiff, and goes up Regency street. I was a-lookin' at some photergraafs in a shop winder when a swell bloke wid a lydy on his arm gives me a shove and sends my 'ead clean through that 'ere winder. Did I cuss and swear? Did I use bad langvidge? No. I remembered w'ere I was, so with the blood all a-streamin' down my face, I rose my 'at graceful an' says, 'I beg your parding.' That's all I says. I beg your parding.' I crushed 'im with breedin'!"—Argonaut.

"A ladies' tailor. This is a ladies' tailoring establishment."

"I ken that."

"Which is a particular line, my man. Many a tailor, and a good tailor, falters there. Now have you ever had any experience at dressmaking?"

"No, but I've worked on kilts."

What is the Value of the Railroads

In order that the reader may have a clearer idea as to the real value of the railroads, and whether or not legislation should be enacted which would reduce their valuation, to the great detriment of the carriers, the following figures are presented:

There are approximately 400,000 miles of track, including switches and side tracks. It is certainly not unfair to figure the value at $25,000 a mile (the cost to-day to build a mile is about $50,000), which would make this one item alone total	$10,000,000,000
There are about 70,000 locomotives in use. The value of these at $30,000 each (the 6,000 or more locomotives bought in the last two years have cost on an average of about $60,000 each for freight and $50,000 each for passenger) totals	2,100,000,000
There are nearly 2,400,000 freight cars which, valued at $1,200 each (the average cost of a freight car to-day is about $2,000) would total	2,880,000,000
There are some 60,000 passenger-train cars which, valued at only $15,000 each (all-steel passenger cars now average $35,000 each) would bring this item to	900,000,000
These four items of roadway and equipment give us an extremely conservative valuation of $15,880,000,000. Yet they do not take into consideration many important items, chief of which are as follows:
Value of terminal yards, often located on highly valuable city property—of all stations, roundhouses, shops, terminal freight and passenger stations, general office buildings, countless section houses and other buildings—of all equipment employed by the railroads for maintenance, such as work cars and locomotives, machinery, tools and derricks—of a vast quantity of current supplies needed in the operation—of telephone and telegraph lines and equipment. Certainly the value of these countless items would amount to at least	4,120,000,000
Bringing the total valuation to not less than	$20,000,000,000

The tentative valuation of the railroads, at the end of 1919, was found by the Interstate Commerce Commission to be $18,900,000,000. This valuation was based on cost and prices up to 1914, and therefore includes no war-time inflation of values. The subsequent investment of nearly $2,000,000,000 makes the valuation for rate-making purposes more than $20,000,000,000.

With the above figures before you, do you consider a reduction to $13,000,000,000 in the valuation of American railroads, now being attempted by certain interests, fair; or does it not appear to you that such a confiscation of values would, in effect, be a denial to the railroads of their chief means of keeping pace with the development of the country?

Our good Sheriff, Mr. Falkner, hustling as he is, has not raided a still in our beat since he has been in office, and if our citizens will only do their duty, attend church regularly and observe the 18th amendment, his work will continue to be light in Beat 11.

FARM FACTS

(By the Extension Department, Auburn.c)

Nothing boosts a community like a prize winning agricultural exhibit at the county fair.

Two thousand head of high-grade feeder calves and steers will be sold at a co-operative sale in Montgomery, October 3.

Rye and oats are good cover crops but they are not legumes and do not, therefore, enrich land like hairy vetch.

The wealthy farmers in any state, county, or community are those who have rich land. Winter legumes make land rich.

Boys and girls will be happier and take more interest in their work if they have something which is their very own.

Good terraces increase the value of land $5.00 per acre, according to Government records. Frequently it is much more. Now is a good time to terrace.

"By turning all cotton stalks under at least three weeks before frost, boll weevils will be starved and very few will survive the winter to puncture cotton squares next year."—W. A. Ruffin, Auburn

The fact that farmers who have given co-operative marketing a fair trial over several years are the most prosperous farmers is proof that co-operative marketing is good for farmers. It must have time to get started.

During a culling demonstration at the home of Jesse Hagood, Town Creek, Ala., Harmon Gardner, of Auburn, and Lundy Morrow, county agent for Lawrence county, culled 12 hens from his flock of 71. The week following the culls laid 3 eggs while the others laid 177.

Mrs. J. H. Fulton of Roebuck, spent a part of last week with her sons, Frank and Gerald Fulton.

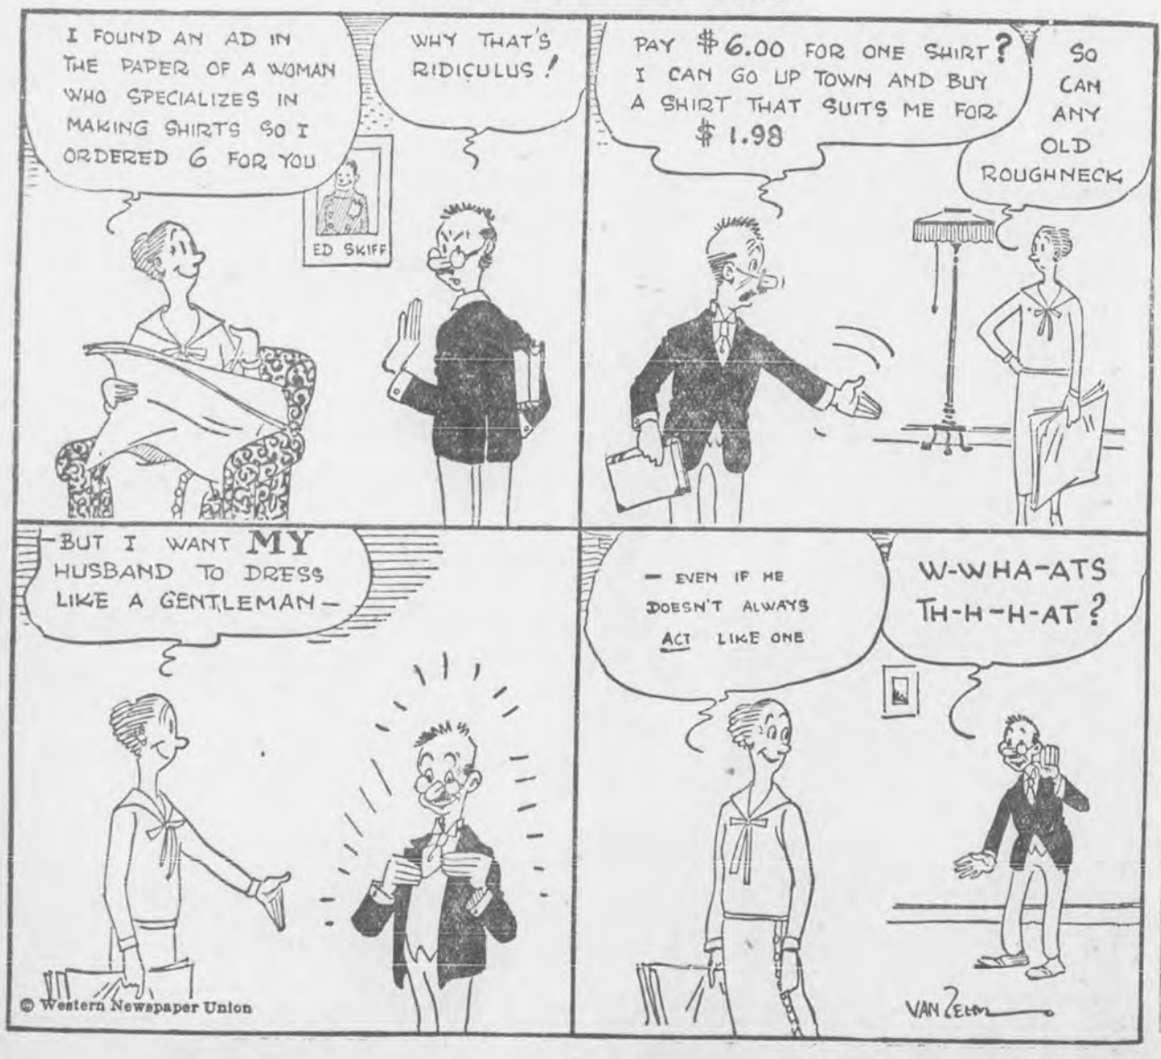
Clothes Make the Man



Denmark and The Danes

A Copenhagen Fishmonger.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

Denmark, with which Americans do not often have contact, has received more than usual attention recently as the owner of Greenland, where our round-the-world flyers found it necessary to alight, as well as the political partner of Iceland, another stopping place in the flight.

Since the sale by Denmark to the United States of the Virgin islands and the establishment of the almost complete independence of Iceland, Greenland is Denmark's only remaining colony. It is, in fact, a Danish monopoly. Its government is distinctly paternalistic, but is scrupulously for the benefit of the natives.

To a very marked degree the government of Denmark itself has come to be a government for the common people, swinging to that situation in less than three-quarters of a century from a highly developed aristocracy.

Even now there is a paradoxical condition of affairs. The court of Denmark has been called "the royalest court in Europe," because it has furnished kings and queens to several thrones besides its own, and its reigning family is related by blood to nearly every crowned head on the continent. It may seem strange that the royalest court of Europe should exist in a country which is largely constructively socialistic. It seems even stranger to us that the farmers in Denmark, who are the most influential part of the population, should take to socialistic methods.

It does not follow, as it does in Sweden and in Germany, that socialists in Denmark should hate a king. They are sometimes in conflict with the existing government and would doubtless use all their influence to obtain a republic if nearly all that can be gained through the application of democratic ideas to government had not been already achieved.

In truth, in Denmark, under a very liberal constitutional monarchy, the government has become so much a part of the people that it is their government. This has, in the eyes of the more conservative Danes, some disadvantages just now, as the present government exists mainly for the poorer classes.

"Team Work" of the Danes.

There is one especially admirable quality that strikes the observer in Denmark—that is the capacity of the Danes for "team-work." When it comes to the question of a reform which the people have thought about and have come to the conclusion that they need, there is no time lost in putting it into activity. To think, among Danish folk, is to act. In this they are unlike their favorite hero of tragedy, Hamlet.

It is refreshing, too, to discover that no great affair concerning the good of the people is undertaken thoughtlessly, and the crown does not oppose in any way reforms that may lessen its privileges or prerogatives.

King Christian X is a Dane of the Danes, and yet sympathetic and tolerant of the legitimate claims of other nations; and in Denmark one sees a constitutional monarchy at its best. Whatever one's prejudices and traditions may be, one is forced to admit that a constitutional monarchy under such circumstances is an ideal institution, especially for a small state.

The population of Denmark, including North Schleswig, returned, under pressure, by Germany after the war, is about 3,250,000. The area of post-war Denmark is 17,120 square miles; it is one-fifteenth the size of Texas and about one-third the size of New York. The Faroe islands are part of the kingdom of Denmark. Iceland, which formerly belonged to Denmark, became a free state in 1874, rather gently ruled by the king of Denmark.

Denmark is almost exclusively devoted to agriculture; and yet not many more than 1,000,000 persons follow the pursuits of agriculture, forestry and fishing. The capital, Copenhagen, is a city too large in proportion to the population of the country; it contains 575,000 persons. Aarhus comes next, with 65,000; Aalorg has 35,000, and Odense, 40,000.

To be as exact as possible, there are 250,000 farmers in the country, formed into 4,000 co-operative societies, which permeate all the economic relations of life. These co-operative societies are the proprietors of all the machinery for buying all that the farmer needs and distributing all that he produces and does not consume himself.

No Graft and No Corners.

There is no graft; no middleman can "corner" any article of necessity; there are no multi-millionaires, with excess profits gained from home industries. In fact, the Dane who would declare that capital is the enemy of labor would be looked on as an economic idiot, just as it would seem equally idiotic to assume that labor existed for the piling up of capital.

In Denmark, money is not an end; it is an instrument, a medium of circulation. And the object for which all parties in politics are struggling—the conservative in Denmark would be looked on as a radical here—is that it should be equally distributed, not for luxuries, but for necessaries.

Until the middle of the Nineteenth century the Danes were brought to the verge of ruin by a stupid system of agriculture, only comparable to that in vogue in some of our cotton-raising states, where the same old crop destroys the nutrition of the soil and the boll-weevil eats its fruits. Scientific agriculture was unknown to them. The growing of grain was a fixed dictum, and rotation of crops a heresy.

Then came Bishop Grundtvig with new ideas of education and Kristen Kold, who started the first people's high school. From Kold's first school grew the great system of Danish high schools, which it is said were the models on which our Chautauquas were founded; and also the system of university extension in English-speaking countries. But neither the Chautauquas nor the university extension courses have been as far-reaching in their effects as the Danish high schools.

It is understood, of course, that these schools are not, like our high schools, introductions to college or the finishing off or the education of those who do not intend to go to college. No requirement is necessary for the student except the desire to learn. There are no degrees given in these schools, no examinations, and no fixed standards of scholarship.

Aristocracy to Decline.

There is an aristocracy in Denmark, an aristocracy of a very high class, as a rule, but it has lost its privileges. Its titles have even less value socially than they have in France, which is a republic, and, under the usage which makes all the sons and daughters of a count or a baron counts and countesses or barons and baronesses, titles soon lose their distinction, and new titles of nobility are no longer given.

The aristocracy, which for a long time controlled the upper house, fought hard against the subdivision of the land, and its members were not sympathetic with the Danish system of credit banks, by which any man of good character, with a very small sum of ready money, might be able to own a farm.

The habit of farming land on shares does not obtain in Denmark. Every man works his own farm. In the summer months, however, over 20,000 Galicians, and other immigrants come into Denmark to dig the beet root and to do other jobs which the Danish farmer prefers not to do. The large-estate owners are obliged every year to provide facilities for these alien laborers, who go home in the autumn quite content.

Denmark is not an industrial country in the sense that it is a country of manufacture. The scientific treatment of one of the worst soils for agricultural purposes in Europe, joined with the equally scientific system of co-operation, enabled it to monopolize the export of butter, bacon and eggs into England and Germany. Before the war the Danes supplied the breakfast table of the British, and the export of milk and cream, and even of beef and hogs, into Germany taxed their capacity.

OPERATION ADVISED FRIEND SAID "DON'T DO IT!"

Try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound First. Proved Good Advice

Chicago, Illinois.—"Just a few lines to let you know what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound did for me. I was married going on for three years, and went to a doctor and was taking treatments twice a week for pains every month. I used to lie in bed three or four days with them and the doctor would call and inject something into my arm to put me asleep so I would not feel the pains. At last she said I would have to be operated on if I wanted any children. Well, I just happened to go to see a friend with her first baby and I told her I was going to the hospital, and she said, 'Don't do it! You go and get a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and you won't need any operation.' So my husband got me a bottle right away. Now I have two lovely children. Believe me, I recommend the Vegetable Compound to any woman I know has any kind of female trouble. It has helped me and a lot of my friends."—"Mrs. A. McANDLESS, 1709 S. Morgan St., Chicago, Ill. ON BEING A COUNTRY JOURNALIST

The University of Missouri recently discussed journalism as a career for women. Active newspaper women told what they knew. Of city work—of necessity—an employee of a big paper spoke. Country journalism held the top of the ladder with an owner and publisher, Mrs. Anna Ewing—better known as Mrs. W. E.—of the Odessa (Mo.) Ledger. She is no grind, with her head buried in her inky presses. She has "interesting sideline occupations, as housekeeper and mother." She enjoys the distinction, among others, of being state chairman of the Democratic women of Missouri. And as for her job, here's part of her address to the university:

"I am speaking of country journalism—country country, where people arise when the lark is a-wing; where we eat our dinners, boiled dinners largely, in the middle of the day; where the prices of poultry, butterfat, corn, hogs and hides are vital statistics; where the highest minded, tenderest hearted, most sympathetic, most helpful, most lovable people most do congregate.

"And the woman's field in this journalism? It is as some one aptly said of her sphere, it has no limit. In this woman's field there is no such phrase as 'I don't know.' You can't say that; it isn't done.

"I am not touching on the financial question; my method is stamped on most of our coins, and my success is always in the forefront of my mind when I sing the doxology. Nor am I going to say much on the subject of news. When your field is a small country community where everybody knows everybody else, often to the third and fourth generations—all their uprisings and downsittings, as it were—you get to feel as if it were all a part of yourself. Every time you write an item you think who will enjoy it. I know a world-renowned journalist said: 'What God has allowed to happen, I am not ashamed to publish.' Neither am I—if it happened in New Hampshire or California. But when fathers have talked heart-to-heart to you about their hopes, their fears, their disappointments for their children; when women have confided in you; when lovers have come to you for advice and comfort; when people have laid their hands on your shoulders and said 'Will you pray for me?' Oh I tell you news has a new meaning. So has life!

"To me the thing that peculiarly differentiates the woman's field is the matter of service. Why, truly, there is not a life or death or birth, or anything a penny's weight of worth, but what a newspaper woman is in it. To be a newspaper woman takes a vast amount of courage, love, tact, bluff, a deep abiding sense of humor, and an unshakable faith in prayer."

A MINT OF CONTENTMENT

Out in Nevada they seem to like the name Anne Martin. There's the militant suffragist who ran for the United States senate three years ago. And there's another with even the same middle initial, H., only, being somewhat the political Anne Martin's senior, this other one prefers to be called Annie. With the name the likeness ends. Anne Martin revels in politics. Annie Martin does not like politics and refuses to take an active part in it.

She knows what she's talking about, too, in the realm of practical politics. She once went into newspaper work. The Carson News gave her a job for four years. The job included "being editor, proprietor, society and city editor, proofreader, compositor (of hand-set type), ad writer, bill collector, bookkeeper, general manager and dramatic critic." Then "the Silver party came into power, and all revenue from politics would be awarded to the opposition paper" so the editor-owner-bookkeeper-reporter of the Carson News sold out.

Previously Annie Martin, who still lives in the house into which her family moved in 1866, had gone through the public schools of Carson City once and then started over again as teacher in the first kindergarten. It was 13 years later, after experimenting with various grades and deciding that she preferred to teach third-graders, that Miss Martin made her newspaper venture.

Next she tried a dry goods store, but "finicky women who spend three hours selecting the right shade of a spool of thread" seemed too much of an irritation to be bothered with. So she tried a stationery store, went back into the reporting game, and substituted as teacher at the State Orphans' home during the illness of the principal teacher. She tried teaching music but did not enjoy it.

Along in 1908 Miss Martin decided to take the civil service examination for clerk of the United States mint in her home city. From that has come the work she likes best. She is now assayer in charge and the only woman, probably, in such work in the world.

DAIRY FACTS

SOILING CROPS ARE REQUIRED FOR MILK

Because of a succession of dry summers in northeastern Minnesota it has become necessary to supplement permanent pastures, if dairy cows are to be properly fed and the milk flow maintained in August just as butterfat prices start on the ascending scale, says M. J. Thompson, superintendent of the Northeast Experiment station of Minnesota university.

Mr. Thompson believes this condition should be anticipated when seeds are being ordered and crops planned. Three things can be done to provide summer succulence, he says.

1. Sweet clover pasture. Not yet generally established; sow seed for 1925.

2. Summer silage. Not wholly practical since most farms with silos have winter capacity only and if there is a carry-over much of it spoils.

3. Soiling crops, that is, crops cut green, hauled in and fed.

"The last offers the cheapest and best solution of the problem," says Mr. Thompson. "Such crops require only a limited acreage. Fall sown rye is the first available in the summer. Oats, though somewhat later, offers the greatest range of seeding, late April to late June, and thus serves more need. Peas may be sown with it. Second crop sweet clover, and later sunflowers (chopped) and corn all make excellent feed. Our herd consumes over 90 per cent of these feeds, so that waste is small. In this manner the milk flow is sustained and prolonged into the winter high price period."

Homemade Spray Mixture Helps Milk Production

Flies on the cows in hot weather often cut down the milk. A good fly spray, well put on, will not only quiet the cows and help the milk run freely, but will also save the temper and language of the milker.

A good spray for this purpose can easily be made a home, according to the cow men of the New York State College of Agriculture at Ithaca. Use 4½ quarts of coal tar dip; 4½ quarts fish oil; 3 quarts coal oil; 3 quarts whale oil; and 1½ quarts oil of tar. Dissolve 3 pounds of laundry soap in water, add the ingredients of the spray, and bring up to 0 gallons with lukewarm soft water.

This spray, applied twice a day—in the morning after milking and in the afternoon while the cows are in the barn for silage or other green feed—will keep the flies away and keep the hair coats of the cow soft.

Thirty gallons of this mixture will spray 40 cows twice a day for ten days, at a cost of one cent a cow a day. Two men with a portable half-barrel cart carrying a spray pump and nozzle can spray 40 cows in five minutes, and save a lot of time, milk, and general unpleasantness.

Average Profitable Age for Cows Kept for Milk

Ten years is the average age at which cows kept for milk are slaughtered for beef, according to investigations made by the United States Department of Agriculture. Thus one can expect a cow to produce for about eight years before becoming too old for profitable production.

In Wisconsin and other dairy states the average age is eleven years; in others, nine years is the average. But the general level for the whole country is ten years.

Cows, when sold for beef slaughter, brought an average price of $31.69 a head. When sold for milk they brought about $62.90. These two prices indicate that the average beef-slaughter price of cows that had been kept for milk eight years is about one-half the average price of cows having a milking future.

Right Time to Cut Rye for Feeding Dairy Cow

Rye should always be cut for hay before the awns harden, and inasmuch as the cows like the hay better when rye is cut about the blooming time, we consider that about the best time to cut rye intended for dairy cow feeding. In fact, rye hay cut from the time of heading out to bloom is reasonably good feed. With all this hay the cows will readily clean up, plus 10 pounds of good legume hay daily for the roughage, a good ration may be had with one pound of the following for each three pounds of milk produced: Ground corn or barley, four parts; ground oats, four parts; wheat bran, two parts; oilmeal one part, gluten meal one pa

Thousands Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It

Applicants for Insurance Should Use Swamp-Root

Judging from reports from druggists who are constantly in direct touch with the public, there is one preparation that has been very successful in overcoming these conditions. The mild and healing influence of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its remarkable record of success.

An examining physician for one of the prominent Life Insurance Companies, in an interview of the subject, made the astonishing statement that one reason why so many applicants for insurance are rejected is because kidney trouble is so common to the American people, and the large majority of those whose applications are declined do not even suspect that they have the disease. Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is on sale at all drug stores in bottles of two sizes, medium and large.

However, if you wish first to test this great preparation, send ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a sample bottle. When writing, be sure and mention this paper.—Advertisement.

"Hornbook" Used Before the Days of Printing

A hornbook was the alphabet-book or primer for learning to read in universal use in England before the days of printing, and common even down to the time of George II. It consisted of a single leaf set in an oak frame, covered with a thin sheet of transparent horn as a protection, whence its name. The leaf contained on one side the alphabet, in large and small letters, also the Lord's Prayer and the nine digits, together with a large number of monosyllables.

The frame had a handle, and this was generally provided with a hole for a string, by means of which the hornbook could be suspended from the pupil's girdle. The back of the frame was ornamented with a rude sketch of St. George and the dragon.

Hornbooks are now very rare. Frequent allusions to them are found in the older writers.—Detroit News.

Young, but Gallant

Little Jackie took the church collection very seriously, and every Sunday morning he saw that his penny was ready.

One day, just as the sidesmen began to take the collection, Jackie noticed that a guest in the family pew was not duly provided.

Sliding along the seat he whispered: "Where's your penny?"

"I didn't bring one," replied the lady.

Time was short, and the matter was urgent, but Jackie came to a decision with great promptitude.

Thrusting his penny into the lady's hand, he whispered:

"Here, take mine! I'll pay for you, and I'll get under the seat."

POWER COMPANY REPRESENTATIVE HERE THIS WEEK

Mr. Easter, a representatives of the Alabama Power Company and the Experiment Station at Auburn, was in Columbiana Tuesday and Wednesday making a series of surveys looking to the establishment of a power line that would lead into Columbiana.

Mr. Easter made four surveys while here; one leading from Childersburg by way of Harpersville and Wilsonville, one from Calera direct and another by way of Shelby, one from Longview.

To Organize Fish and Game Association

All citizens of Shelby county who are interested in the conservation of fish and game are called to attend a meeting at the courthouse in Columbiana on Saturday, October 11th. RADIO SERVICE IS GROWING BETTER

These are fine nights for Radio and those who have receiving sets are in good luck. There is so much that is interesting that is going on in this big country of ours, and it is easy, with a Radio set to keep right up with whatever one is interested in.

One night last week there was a footbali game played in Cincinnati that was broadcast play by play. The game was heard distinctly in Columbiana.

Another evening the President of the United States went over to Philadelphia to deliver an address on the one hundred fiftieth anniversary of the meeting of the first Continental Congress. His address was heard distinctly in Columbiana

On Monday evening Secretary Hoover of the president's cabinet spoke on some of the issues involved in government ownership of public utilities.

The past week has seen great interest in the close of the baseball season, and especially in the race of certain teams for pennant honors. Every evening the baseball results have been broadcast and picked up in Columbiana just a little while after the close of the games.

In addition to all these things, musical programs, lectures and other forms of entertainment, the very best that the whole country affords, are broadcast every evening and can be heard in one's home just as clearly and distinctly as if the instruments or the lecturers were in the room with the listener.

There was 25 or more bales of cotton carried from here to Childersburg last Saturday and sold for a very good price.

Your "Scribe" was in Columbiana several days last week and I must say as a truth that I never saw a little place improving in the way of new buildings as Columbiana. You have some new buildings that can't be beaten in Birmingham. Your merchants seemed to be doing a good business. The lawyers and county officers garages, agents of all kind, all seemed to be thriving nicely, and my prediction is that Columbiana is fast coming to the front. Hurrah for Columbiana.

How the Railroads Helped You to Stand the Hottest Summer in Years!

Vacation days are over and the hot spell has broken. The weather bureau tells us that the summer of 1924 brought to the South more intense heat and a longer heated period than any in years. How did you stand it? Did the railroads help? Were you made more comfortable by the transportation systems of the country?

Did you have a vacation trip to cooler climate, or did you weather the weather in the comforts of your own home? In either event, the railroads played an important part—as they do every month in the year—in adding to your comfort.

Milk, fresh vegetables, fruits and melons—the principal items of summer diet—would have been impossible to secure or prohibitive in price but for the railroads.

As we enter the period of Fall activities, with the great crop movement just commencing, the opportunity is afforded the American citizen to look both forward and backward at the task which is being so capably accomplished by the railroads.

Shall the good work go on; or shall it be hampered by destructive legislation which in practically every instance is fostered by persons entirely unfamiliar with transportation problems?

IMPROVED UNIFORM INTERNATIONAL

Sunday School Lesson

By REV. P. B. FITZWATER, D.D., Dean of the Evening School, Moody Bible Institute of Chicago.
(©, 1924, Western Newspaper Union.)

Lesson for October 5

THE CHOICE OF THE TWELVE

LESSON TEXT—Matt. 10:1-42.

GOLDEN TEXT—Freely ye have received, freely give.—Matt. 10:8.

PRIMARY TOPIC — Jesus Chooses Twelve Friends.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The Twelve Apostles.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Partners With Jesus in His Work.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Urgent Need for Full Time Christian Workers.

Having set forth the laws of the kingdom in the Sermon on the Mount, and His power to administer the affairs of the kingdom in the miracles of the eighth and ninth chapters, Matthew now sets before us the methods which the King adopted in the propagation of the kingdom. It should be clearly noted that this chapter does not outline the policy of missionary endeavor in this age. To teach it thus will be a grievous blunder. The following divisions of the chapter suggest the dispensational aspects of the lesson.

I. Instructions Bearing Immediately Upon the Apostles' Work to the Death of Christ (vv. 1-15).

In strictness of interpretation these teachings have no application to any later period.

1. The Ministers Chosen (vv. 1-4). These twelve humble men were chosen and commissioned to carry forth the work of the propagation of the kingdom. They were not commissioned with church truth. These twelve stood in a peculiar relation to Israel.

2. The Sphere of Their Mission (vv. 5, 6). They were to go only to Jews. They had no message for Gentiles, or even Samaritans. After Pentecost this sphere was widened. (See Luke 24:46-49; Acts 1:8). This would be a strange restriction to place upon ministers today.

3. Their Message (v. 7). "The kingdom of heaven is at hand." This meant that the promised kingdom of Israel was at hand, that Jesus Christ, the promised King, was present and ready to set up His kingdom if they were willing to have it. This differs widely from the message of the ministers today. After the church is translated, the same message will be taken up for a brief time by the remaining remnant. (See Acts 15:13-18; Rom. 11; Rev. 7).

4. The Supernatural Authentication of Their Mission (v. 8). They were clothed with power to work miracles. These wonderful works were really done by the twelve. Where is the minister today who is so foolhardy as to try to fulfill this?

5. Their Maintenance (vv. 9, 10). They were to make no provision for their support, but to depend wholly upon the Lord who sent them. They had received the message and power gratuitously, and they were to give it in the same way (v. 9). Happy, indeed, would we be today if we had more ministers who are willing to trust the Lord for their support instead of bargaining for a stated salary!

6. Responsibilities of Those to Whom the Message Was Delivered (vv. 11-15). Upon entering the city or town they were to inquire for a respectable place to stay. Into that home they were to bring peace. If the people would not receive them or hear their message, they were to pronounce judgment upon them, and the turning of the Lord from them was symbolized by the ministers wiping the dust from their feet when turning from the people who rejected their message.

II. Instructions Concerning the Testimony From Pentecost Onward (vv. 16-23).

After Pentecost, testimony for Christ would be fraught with great danger. Both Jews and Gentiles would assail the messengers with the most bitter persecutions. They were scourged in the synagogues before heathen magistrates. Instead of bringing peace to the homes they brought divisions of the fiercest kind among families. In their defense they were to rely upon the Holy Spirit to aid them. These conditions were literally fulfilled in the period from Pentecost to the destruction of Jerusalem. Since the fall of Jerusalem no one has ever been scourged in a synagogue.

III. Teaching Applicable in All Ages (vv. 24-42).

The disciple has the position of oneness with his Master. He is to courageously declare the whole counsel of God, though violently opposed, for so completely is the Lord identified with His disciples that He accepts treatment of them as treatment of Himself.

Seeking the Mercy of God

We implore the mercy of God, not that He may leave us in peace in our vices, but that He may free us from them.—Pascal.

Share in His Blessings

Great faith must have great trials.—Evangelical Visitor.

Important to All Women Readers of This Paper

Swamp-Root a Fine Medicine

Thousands upon thousands of women have kidney or bladder trouble and never suspect it.

Women's complaints often prove to be nothing else but kidney trouble, or the result of kidney or bladder disease.

If the kidneys are not in a healthy condition they may cause the other organs to become diseased.

You may suffer pain in the back, headache and loss of ambition.

Poor health makes you nervous, irritable and may be despondent; it makes any one so.

But hundreds of women claim that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, by restoring health to the kidneys, proved to be just the remedy needed to overcome such conditions.

Many send for a sample bottle to see what Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder medicine will do for them. By enclosing ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., you may receive sample size bottle by parcel post. You can purchase medium and large size bottles at all drug stores.—Advertisement.

LITTLE ROCK OFFICER GAINS TWENTY POUNDS

And Recovers Strength by Taking Tanlac.

"Tanlac increased my weight 20 lbs. and left me feeling like a new man three years ago and I am strong for it," recently affirmed J. J. Hardcastle, a special police officer, 311 Poplar St., North Little Rock, Ark.

"Two years ago stomach trouble had pulled me down to where I simply felt all played out and miserable. I suffered so from gas bloating, pains and other uncomfortable symptoms after meals that I actually dreaded to eat anything. My nerves were all undone, too, and I had so little energy that I just had to drive myself to work.

"My improvement started with my first bottle of Tanlac and five bottles of the medicine put my stomach in condition so I can eat anything I want and all I want without a touch of indigestion. The medicine also set me right in a general way and I am glad to praise it to everybody."

Tanlac is for sale by all good druggists. Accept no substitute. Over 40 million bottles sold.

Tanlac Vegetable Pills for constipation; made and recommended by the manufacturers of Tanlac.

Island Springs Up

Warning beacons have been erected on a new island which sprang up recently in the sea of Azov, an arm of the Black sea, as a result of a maritime convulsion. A gigantic geyser of earth, rocks and smoke spouted for more than ten minutes. At the end of that time a new island had appeared as if by magic out of the water.

Church Has Free Jitneys

In order to increase and hold attendance at his church the pastor of a rural church in Ohio has mapped out routes which go past members of his congregation and has arranged with his members who own automobiles to allow their cars to be free jitneys for others who do not own cars. The attendance has grown as a result.

SUBSCRIPTION, the year $1.50

Entered at the Columbiana, Ala., Postoffice as second class mail, under act of Congress of March, 3rd, 1879.

We wish to ask again that our friends who send in news letters will always sign their real names. Unless they do this we cannot publish their letters. Several good letters had to be left out this week because we did not know who wrote them. We do not publish the names.

HARPERSVILLE

Claude Cadell of Denison, Texas, is visiting relatives and friends here.

"Jemmie Slimp" says that there ought to be a fixed price on cotton by the government.

Prof. Norman Baker has been elected principal of the Helena school and left here Saturday to begin his work. Norman is a splendid young man, fully competent to fill the high position and I believe he will give the good people of Helena splendid service.

Now the Harpersville school tax election is over and a big majority of our people have said we favor a tax for school purposes. So let us all come together, work together and build up a school that all Shelby county will be proud of, for where there is unity there is strength.

There was 25 or more bales of cotton carried from here to Childersburg last Saturday and sold for a very good price.

Your "Scribe" was in Columbiana several days last week and I must say as a truth that I never saw a little place improving in the way of new buildings as Columbiana. You have some new buildings that can't be beaten in Birmingham. Your merchants seemed to be doing a good business. The lawyers and county officers garages, agents of all kind, all seemed to be thriving nicely, and my prediction is that Columbiana is fast coming to the front. Hurrah for Columbiana.

How the Railroads Helped You to Stand the Hottest Summer in Years!

Vacation days are over and the hot spell has broken. The weather bureau tells us that the summer of 1924 brought to the South more intense heat and a longer heated period than any in years. How did you stand it? Did the railroads help? Were you made more comfortable by the transportation systems of the country?

Did you have a vacation trip to cooler climate, or did you weather the weather in the comforts of your own home? In either event, the railroads played an important part—as they do every month in the year—in adding to your comfort.

Milk, fresh vegetables, fruits and melons—the principal items of summer diet—would have been impossible to secure or prohibitive in price but for the railroads.

As we enter the period of Fall activities, with the great crop movement just commencing, the opportunity is afforded the American citizen to look both forward and backward at the task which is being so capably accomplished by the railroads.

Shall the good work go on; or hampered by destructive legislation which in practically every instance is fostered by persons entirely unfamiliar with transportation problems?

IMPROVED UNIFORM INTERNATIONAL

Sunday School Lesson

By REV. P. B. FITZWATER, D.D., Dean of the Evening School, Moody Bible Institute of Chicago.)
(©, 1924, Western Newspaper Union.)

Lesson for October 5

THE CHOICE OF THE TWELVE

LESSON TEXT—Matt. 10:1-42.

GOLDEN TEXT—Freely ye have received, freely give.—Matt. 10:8.

PRIMARY TOPIC — Jesus Chooses Twelve Friends.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The Twelve Apostles.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Partners With Jesus in His Work.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Urgent Need for Full Time Christian Workers.

Having set forth the laws of the kingdom in the Sermon on the Mount, and His power to administer the affairs of the kingdom in the miracles of the eighth and ninth chapters, Matthew now sets before us the methods which the King adopted in the propagation of the kingdom. It should be clearly noted that this chapter does not outline the policy of missionary endeavor in this age. To teach it thus will be a grievous blunder. The following divisions of the chapter suggest the dispensational aspects of the lesson.

I. Instructions Bearing Immediately Upon the Apostles' Work to the Death of Christ (vv. 1-15).

In strictness of interpretation these teachings have no application to any later period.

1. The Ministers Chosen (vv. 1-4). These twelve humble men were chosen and commissioned to carry forth the work of the propagation of the kingdom. They were not commissioned with church truth. These twelve stood in a peculiar relation to Israel.

2. The Sphere of Their Mission (vv. 5, 6). They were to go only to Jews. They had no message for Gentiles, or even Samaritans. After Pentecost this sphere was widened. (See Luke 24:46-49; Acts 1:8). This would be a strange restriction to place upon ministers today.

3. Their Message (v. 7). "The kingdom of heaven is at hand." This meant that the promised kingdom of Israel was at hand, that Jesus Christ, the promised King, was present and ready to set up His kingdom if they were willing to have it. This differs widely from the message of the ministers today. After the church is translated, the same message will be taken up for a brief time by the remaining remnant. (See Acts 15:13-18; Rom. 11; Rev. 7).

4. The Supernatural Authentication of Their Mission (v. 8). They were clothed with power to work miracles. These wonderful works were really done by the twelve. Where is the minister today who is so foolhardy as to try to fulfill this?

5. Their Maintenance (vv. 9, 10). They were to make no provision for their support, but to depend wholly upon the Lord who sent them. They had received the message and power gratuitously, and they were to give it in the same way (v. 9). Happy, indeed, would we be today if we had more ministers who are willing to trust the Lord for their support instead of bargaining for a stated salary!

6. Responsibilities of Those to Whom the Message Was Delivered (vv. 11-15). Upon entering the city or town they were to inquire for a respectable place to stay. Into that home they were to bring peace. If the people would not receive them or hear their message, they were to pronounce judgment upon them, and the turning of the Lord from them was symbolized by the ministers wiping the dust from their feet when turning from the people who rejected their message.

II. Instructions Concerning the Testimony From Pentecost Onward (vv. 16-23).

After Pentecost, testimony for Christ would be fraught with great danger. Both Jews and Gentiles would assail the messengers with the most bitter persecutions. They were scourged in the synagogues before heathen magistrates. Instead of bringing peace to the homes they brought divisions of the fiercest kind among families. In their defense they were to rely upon the Holy Spirit to aid them. These conditions were literally fulfilled in the period from Pentecost to the destruction of Jerusalem. Since the fall of Jerusalem no one has ever been scourged in a synagogue.

III. Teaching Applicable in All Ages (vv. 24-42).

The disciple has the position of oneness with his Master. He is to courageously declare the whole counsel of God, though violently opposed, for so completely is the Lord identified with His disciples that He accepts treatment of them as treatment of Himself.

Seeking the Mercy of God

We implore the mercy of God, not that He may leave us in peace in our vices, but that He may free us from them.—Pascal.

Share in His Blessings

Only those who belong to the Lord's people have a share in His richest blessings.—Evangelical Teacher.

Great Faith

Great faith must have great trials.—Evangelical Visitor.

Swamp-Root a Fine Medicine

Thousands upon thousands of women have kidney or bladder trouble and never suspect it.

If the kidneys are not in a healthy condition they may cause the other organs to become diseased.

You may suffer pain in the back, headache and loss of ambition.

Poor health makes you nervous, irritable and may be despondent; it makes any one so.

But hundreds of women claim that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, by restoring health to the kidneys, proved to be just the remedy needed to overcome such conditions.

Many send for a sample bottle to see what Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder medicine will do for them. By enclosing ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., you may receive sample size bottle by parcel post. You can purchase medium and large size bottles at all drug stores.—Advertisement.

LITTLE ROCK OFFICER GAINS TWENTY POUNDS

And Recovers Strength by Taking Tanlac.

"Tanlac increased my weight 20 lbs. and left me feeling like a new man three years ago and I am strong for it," recently affirmed J. J. Hardcastle, a special police officer, 311 Poplar St., North Little Rock, Ark.

"Two years ago stomach trouble had pulled me down to where I simply felt all played out and miserable. I suffered so from gas bloating, pains and other uncomfortable symptoms after meals that I actually dreaded to eat anything. My nerves were all undone, too, and I had so little energy that I just had to drive myself to work.

"My improvement started with my first bottle of Tanlac and five bottles of the medicine put my stomach in condition so I can eat anything I want and all I want without a touch of indigestion. The medicine also set me right in a general way and I am glad to praise it to everybody."

Tanlac is for sale by all good druggists. Accept no substitute. Over 40 million bottles sold.

Tanlac Vegetable Pills for constipation; made and recommended by the manufacturers of Tanlac.

Island Springs Up

Warning beacons have been erected on a new island which sprang up recently in the sea of Azov, an arm of the Black sea, as a result of a maritime convulsion. A gigantic geyser of earth, rocks and smoke spouted for more than ten minutes. At the end of that time a new island had appeared as if by magic out of the water.

Church Has Free Jitneys

In order to increase and hold attendance at his church the pastor of a rural church in Ohio has mapped out routes which go past members of his congregation and has arranged with his members who own automobiles to allow their cars to be free jitneys for others who do not own cars. The attendance has grown as a result.

Forests Prevent Floods

More than 2,122,970 acres of forest lands have been acquired by the federal government on the watersheds of navigable streams as a safeguard against floods and to promote the regularity of stream flow, it is disclosed in a circular issued recently by the forest service. The purchase of the land was provided for 13 years ago by the passage of the Weeks law.

The federal government already controlled large national forests in the West which to a large extent were located on the watersheds of navigable streams there, so most of the land acquired under the Weeks law is in the East and South.

ZEN OF THE Y. D.

A Novel of the Foothills

By ROBERT STEAD

Author of "The Cow Puncher"—"The Homesteaders"—"Neighbors," etc.

Copyright by ROBERT STEAD

TRANSLEY'S RING

SYNOPSIS. — Transley's hay-cutting outfit, after stacking 2,000 tons, is on its way to the big Y.D. ranch headquarters. Transley is a master of men and circumstances. Linder, foreman, is substantial, but not self-assertive. George Drazk, one of the men, is an irresponsible chap who proposes to every woman he meets. Transley and Linder dine with Y.D. and his wife and daughter Zen. Y.D. instructs Transley to cut the South Y.D., "spite o' h—l an' high water" and a fellow named Landson. Drazk proposes to Zen and is neatly rebuffed. Transley pitches camp on the South Y.D. and finds Landson's outfit cutting hay. Dennison Grant, Landson's manager, notifies Transley that he is working under a lease from the legal owners and warns Transley off. All of which means war. Y.D. and Zen ride to the South Y.D. Zen is a natural vamp, not yet halter-broke and ripe for mating. Y.D. has taken a liking to Transley. Zen holds Transley off and encourages Linder. Zen enjoys the prospect of a race between Transley and Linder for her favor, but secretly laughs at both. She has another and more serious encounter with Drazk. Y.D. mowing machines are ruined by iron stakes set in the grass. Zen prevents open war with Landson. Transley half-way proposes and is turned off. Drazk sets a fire that attacks the Landson stacks. The Y.D. outfit hastens to aid the enemy. Zen rides off alone to help. The wind changes and the Y.D. people now have to fight the prairie fire. Zen rides into the river to escape flames. Drazk tries to abduct her. She drowns him—or thinks she has. Grant overtakes her. In trying to ride through fire Zen is thrown and knocked senseless. Zen comes to after several hours of unconsciousness to find herself in the dark with Grant. She has a sprained ankle and both horses have run away. So she and Grant sit on a rock and tell their past lives. Grant, it appears, is a rich man's son who scorns wealth in order to live his own life. Y.D. and his men arrive after daylight. Naturally, in the circumstances, haying is abandoned. Grant rides off. Transley goes to the nearest town. He returns and induces Y.D. to go into partnership with him in the contracting and building business. Transley sweeps Zen off her feet by the force of his love-making.

When she came down her father and mother and Transley were sitting about the table in the living-room; the room hung with trophies of the chase and of competition; the room which had been the nucleus of the Y.D. estate. There was a colored cover on the table, and the shaded oil lamp in the center sent a comfortable glow of light downward and about. The mammoth shadows of the three people fell on the log walls, darting silently from position to position with their every movement.

Her mother arose as Zen entered the room, and took her hands in a warm, tender grip.

"You're really leaving us," she said. "I'm not saying I object. I think Mr. Transley will make you a good husband. He is a man of energy, like your father. He will do well. You will not know the hardships that we knew in our early married life." Their eyes met, and there was a moment's pause.

"You will not understand for many years what this means to me, Zenith," her mother said, and turned quickly to her place at the table.

She could not remember what they had talked about after that. She had been conscious of Transley's eyes often on her, and of a certain spiritual exaltation within her. She could not remember what she had said, but she knew she had talked with unusual vivacity and charm. It was as though certain storehouses of brilliance in her being, of which she had been unaware, had been suddenly opened to her. It was as though she had been intoxicated by a very subtle wine which did not deaden, but rather quickened, all her faculties.

Afterwards, she had spent long hours among the foothills, thinking and thinking. There were times when the flame of that strange exaltation burned low, indeed; times when it seemed almost to expire. There were moments—hours—of misgivings. She could not understand the strange docility which had come over her; the unprecedented willingness to have her course shaped by another. That strange willingness came as near to frightening Zen as anything had ever done. She felt that she was being carried along in a stream; that she was making no resistance; that she had no desire to resist. She had a strange fear that some day she would need qualities of self-direction, and those qualities would refuse to arise at her command.

She did not fear Transley. She believed in him. She believed in his ability to grapple with anything that stood in his way; to thrust it aside, and press on. She respected the judgment of her father and her mother, and both of them believed in Transley. He would succeed; he would seize the opportunities this young country afforded and rise to power and influence upon them. He would be kind, he would be generous. He would make her proud of him. What more could she want?

That was just it. There were dark moments when she felt that surely there must be something more than all this. She did not know what it was—she could not analyze her thoughts or give them definite form—but in these dark moments she feared that she was being tricked, that the whole thing was a sham which she would discover when it was too late. She did not suspect her mother, or her father, or Transley, one or all, of being parties to this trick; she believed that they did not know it existed. She herself did not know it existed. But the fear was there.

After a week she admitted, much against her will, that possibly Dennison Grant had something to do with it. She had not seen him since she had pressed his fingers and he had ridden away through the smoke-haze of the South Y.D. She had dutifully tried to force him from her mind. But he would not stay out of it. It was about that fact that her misgivings seemed most to center. When she would be thinking of Transley, and wondering about the future, suddenly she would discover that she was not thinking of Transley, but of Dennison Grant. These discoveries shocked and humiliated her. It was an impossible position. She would throw Grant forcibly out of her mind and turn to Transley. And then, in an unguarded moment, Transley would fade from her consciousness, and she would know again that she was thinking of Grant.

At length she allowed herself the luxury of thinking frankly about Dennison Grant. It was a luxury. It brought her a secret happiness which she was wholly at a loss to understand, but which was very delightful, nevertheless. She amused herself with comparing Grant with Transley. They had two points in common: their physical perfection and their fearless, self-confident manner. With these exceptions they seemed to be complete contradictions. The ambitious Transley worshiped success; the philosophical Grant despised it. That difference in attitude toward the world and its affairs was a ridge which separated the whole current of their lives. It even, in a way, shut one from the view of the other; at least it shut Grant from the view of Transley. Transley would never understand Grant, but Grant might, and probably did, understand Transley. That was why Grant was the greater of the two. . . .

She reproached herself for such a thought; it was disloyal to admit that this stranger on the Landson ranch was a greater man than her husband-to-be. And yet honesty—or, perhaps, something deeper than honesty—compelled her to make that admission. . . . She ran back over the remembered incidents of the night they had spent together, marooned like shipwrecked sailors on a rock in the foothills. His attentiveness, his courtesy, his freedom from any conventional restraint, his manly respect which was so much greater than conventional restraint—all these came back to her with a poignant tenderness. She pictured Transley in his place. Transley would probably have proposed even before he bandaged her ankle. Grant had not said a word of love, or even of affection. He had talked freely of himself—at her request—but there had been nothing that might not have been said before the world. She had been safe with Grant. . . .

After she had thought on this theme for a while Zen would acknowledge to herself that the situation was absurd and impossible. Grant had given no evidence of thinking more of her than of any other girl whom he might have met. He had been chivalrous only. She had sat up with a start at the thought that there might be another girl. . . . Or there might be no girl. Grant was an unusual character. . . .

At any rate, the thing for her to do was to forget about him. She should have no place in her mind for any man but Transley. It was true he had stampeded her, but she had accepted the situation in which she found herself. Transley was worthy of her—she had nothing to take back—she would go through with it.

On the principle that the way to drive an unwelcome thought out of the mind is to think vigorously about something else, Zen occupied herself with plans and day-dreams centering about the new home that was to be built in town. Neither her father nor Transley had as yet returned from the trip on which they had gone with a view to forming a partnership, so there had been no opportunity to discuss the plans for the future, but Zen took it for granted that Transley would build in town. He was so enthusiastic over the possibilities of that young and bustling center of population that there was no doubt he would want to throw in his lot with it. This prospect was quite pleasing to the girl; it would leave her within easy distance of her old home; it would introduce her to a type of society with which she was well acquainted, and where she could do herself justice, and it would not break up the associations of her young life. She would still be able, now and again, to take long rides through the tawny foothills; to mingle with her old friends; possibly to maintain a somewhat sisterly acquaintance with Dennison Grant. . . .

After ten days Y.D. returned—alone. He had scarcely been able to believe the developments which he had seen. It was as though the sleepy, lazy cow-town had become electrified. Y.D. had looked on for three days, wondering if he were not in some kind of a dream from which he would awaken presently among his herds in the foothills. After three days he bought a property. Before he left he sold it at a profit greater than the earnings of his first five years on the ranch. It would be indeed a stubborn confidence which could not be won by such an experience, and before leaving for the ranch Y.D. had arranged for Transley practically an open credit with his bankers, and had undertaken to send down all the horses and equipment that could be spared.

Transley had planned to return to the foothills with Y.D., but at the last moment business matters developed which required his attention. He placed a tiny package in Y.D.'s capacious palm.

"For the girl," he said. "I should deliver it myself, but you'll explain?"

Y.D. fumbled the tiny package into a vest pocket. "Sure, I'll attend to that," he promised. "Wasn't much of these fancy trimmin's when I settled into double harness, but lots of things has changed since then. You'll be out soon?"

"Just as soon as business will stand for it. Not a minute longer."

On his return home Y.D., after maintaining an exasperating silence until supper was finished, casually handed the package to his daughter.

"Some trinket Transley sent out," he explained. "He'll be here himself as soon as business permits."

She took the package with a glow of expectancy, started to open it, then folded the paper again and ran up to her room. Here she tempted herself for minutes before she would finally open it, whetting the appetite of anticipation to the full. . . . The gem justified her little play. It was magnificent; more beautiful and more expensive than anything her father ever had bought her.

She hesitated strangely about putting it on. To Zen it seemed that the putting on of Transley's ring would be a voluntary act symbolizing her acceptance of him. If she had been carried off her feet—swept into the position in which she found herself—that explanation would not apply to the deliberate placing of his ring upon her finger. There would be no excuse; she could never again plead that she had been the victim of Transley's precipitateness. This would be deliberate, and she must do it herself.

She rather blamed Transley for not having left his old business and come to perform this rite himself, as he should have done. What was one day of business, more or less? Yet Zen gathered no hint from that incident that always, with Transley, business would come first. It was symbolic—prophetic—but she did not see the sign nor understand the prophecy.

She held the ring between her fingers; slipped it off and on her little fingers; held it so the rays of the sun fell through the window upon it and danced before her eyes in all their primal colors.

"I have to put this on," she said, pursing her lips firmly, "and—and forget about Dennison Grant!"

For a long time she thought of that and all it meant. Then she raised the jewel to her lips.

"Help me—help me—" she murmured. With a quick little impetuous motion she drew it on to the finger where it belonged. There she gazed upon it for a moment, as though fascinated by it. Then she fell upon her bed and lay motionless until long after the valley was wrapped in shadow.

The events of these days had almost driven from Zen's mind the tragedy of George Drazk. When she thought of it at all it presented such a grotesque unreality—it was such an unreasonable thing—that it assumed the vague qualities of a dream. It was something unreal and very much better forgotten, and it was only by an unwilling effort at such times that she could bring herself to know that it was not unreal. It was a matter that concerned her tremendously. Sooner or later Drazk's disappearance must be noted—perhaps his body would be found—and while she had little fear that anyone would associate her with the tragedy it was a most unpleasant thing to think about. Sometimes she wondered if she should not tell her father or Transley just what had happened, but she shrank from doing so as from the confession of a crime. Mostly she was able to think of other matters.

Her father brought it up in a startling way at breakfast. Absolutely out of a blue sky he said, "Did you know, Zen, that Drazk has disappeared? Transley tells me you were int'rested a bit in him, or perhaps I should say he was int'rested in you."

Zen was so overcome by this startling change in the conversation that she was unable to answer. The color went from her face and she leaned low over her plate to conceal her agitation.

"Yep," continued Y.D., with no more concern than if a steer had been lost from the herd. "Transley said to tell you Drazk had disappeared an' he reckoned you wouldn't be bothered any more with him."

"Drazk was nothing to me," she managed to say. "How can you think he was?"

"Now who said he was?" her father retorted. "For a young woman with the price of a herd of steers on her third finger you're sort o' short this mornin'. Now I'm jus' wonderin' how far you can see through a board fence, Zen. Are you surprised that Drazk has disappeared?"

She was entirely at a loss to understand the drift of her father's talk. He could not connect her with Drazk's disappearance, or he would not approach the matter with such unconcern. That was unthinkable. Neither could Transley, or he would not have sent so brutal a message. And yet it was clear that they thought she should be interested.

Her father's question demanded an answer.

"What should I care?" she ventured at length.

"I didn't ask you whether you cared. I asked you whether you was surprised."

"Drazk's movements were — are nothing to me. I don't know that I have any occasion to be surprised about anything he may do."

"Well, I'm rather glad you're not, because if you don't jump to conclusions, perhaps other people won't. Not that it makes any partic'lar diff'rence."

"Dad," she cried in desperation, "whatever do you mean?"

"It was all plain enough to me, an' plain enough to Transley," her father continued with remarkable calmness. "We seen it right from the first."

"You're talking in riddles, Y.D.," his wife remonstrated. "You're getting Zen all worked up."

"Jewelry seems to be mighty upsettin'," Y.D. commented. "There was nothin' like that in our engagement, eh, Jessie? Well, to come to the point. There was a fire which burned up the valley of the South Y.D. Fires don't start themselves—usually. This one started among the Landson stacks, so it was natural enough to suspec' Y.D. or some of his sympathizers. Well it wasn't Y.D., an' I reckon it wasn't Zen, an' it wasn't Transley nor Linder an' every one of the gang's accounted for excep' Drazk. Drazk thought he was doin' a great piece of business when he fired the Landson hay, but when the wind turned an' burned up the whole valley Drazk sees where he can't play no hero part around here so he loses himself for good. I gathered from Transley that Drazk had been botherin' you a little, Zen, which is why I told you."

The girl's heart was pounding violently at this explanation. It was logical, and would be accepted readily by those who knew Drazk. She would not trust herself in further conversation, so she slipped away as soon as she could and spent the day riding down the river.

Of course, Grant shows up—and proposes marriage. Does Zen say "yes"—or does she show him Transley's ring?

DEEP INTEREST IN REVIVAL MEETING AT BAPTIST CHURCH

The revival meeting in progress at the Baptist church in Columbiana this week is being attended by large congregations and great interest is being manifested in the services. Rev. R. W. Stuckey, the pastor of the church, is doing the preaching and the singing is in charge of A. B. McKinley of Centerville. Mr. Stuckey selects practical subjects for his sermons and is preaching with great earnestness. The singer, who was introduced as a Christian business man, is a good singer and a good leader. The excellent singing is regarded as one of the attractive features of the services. It is expected that the services will be continued through next Sunday.

At the Sunday night service the pastor carrying out instructions given at the church conference held Sundaay afternoon, made some very important appointments of workers in the church. Among these were: T. R. Walton, J. B. Turner and T. C. Rush as deacons, A. R. Cooper as church treasurer, and a finance committee with Judge L. B. Riddle as chairman, and Miss Virgil Minor and Miss Dottie Carter as members.

Plans were made at the conference, Mr. Stuckey announced, for the adoption of the budget system of church financing and supplies were ordered. An every member canvas of the church will be made in a short time.

Good Interest In School at Shelby

Shelby, Ala., Oct. 6.—The Shelby schools opened last Monday with an enrollment of 100 pupils. We are expecting a great year as the people are very much interested in their school. They are concerned about the length of the term. The county will provide funds to run the school for only 5 months but our people are not satisfied with that little training for their boys and girls so they are going to supplement these funds in order to have a longer term.

KIWANIANS URGE CROSSING STOPS

WILL ASK LEGISLATURE TO PROVIDE PENALTY FOR FAILURE OF MOTORISTS TO COME TO FULL STOP

Bessemer.—Kiwanis Clubs throughout the State will be asked to urge the next session of the Legislature to pass a law providing a grave penalty for the failure of motorists to come to a full stop before passing a railroad crossing. A committee to get the movement under way was appointed at the luncheon meeting of the Ensley Kiwanis Club recently, following an address by J. B. Tucker, veterian engineer of the Seminole Limited, who has pulled a throttle for 35 years.

"My run between here and Jackson includes about 347 grade crossings," Engineer Tucker said lately, we have been required to blow the whistle one-eighth of a mile from the crossing and keep it open until we pass. In other days, we blew the whistle one-quarter of a mile away. The present rule has saved lives."

Mr. Tucker's appeal was considered one of the most impressive ever made before the Ensley Kiwanians.

Rev. E. C. Scott, Dr. Nat G. Clarke and George Bryaum, explained laws in States they have visited providing a penalty for anyone driving past a crossing without coming to a full stop. The committee to ask the co-operation of other Kiwanis Clubs is composed of Dr. E. C. Scott, Simon Goldstein and I. E. Bennett.

The Trust Company, acting for bondholders, set out in the petition that total of $75,000 of the sewer company bonds were held, and accrued interest of $50,000, making a total of $125,000 due the bondholders. In placing the sewer company in receivership, the sewer patrons will lose about $12,000 in overcharges collected by the company under new rates which had been in effect for the past three years. By a decision of the United States Supreme Court recently the new rates were declared illegal and by operation of that decision the overcharges would have had to be refunded to the patrons.

The poles will be placed uniformally in front of business houses on the outside edge of the sidewalks. With upwards of 200 flags of uniform size displayed at one time, the city is expected to present an impressive appearance on patriotic occasions. Officers of the Legion point out that there are 17 days in the year when the national flag may be properly displayed.

Franchise of the Muscle Shoals Gas Company, of Florence, for the furnishing of gas to Sheffield and Tuscumbia was revoked by a decree signed by Judge Almon in the Court of Equity. The company is understood to have agreed to revocation without protest. The company had not served Tuscumbia with gas for several years and no gas has been supplied to Sheffield since January last, when the main across the Tennessee River was broken. It is stated that due to erection of Dam No. 1, Government restrictions for rebuilding the main across the river made the cost prohibitive, causing the company to abandon its attempts to supply gas to the two cities.

Grady Hale, of Murrycross, was in Gadsden hunting for the man who drove a Ford automobile against his grist mill, completely wrecking the plant. Parties living in the neighborhood say the Ford was racing to pass a large car, left the road and dashed into the mill, 50 feet away. It was able to continue on its way after the accident.

TAILORED MODES FOR FALL; HABITS ARE CONSERVATIVE

AMERICAN women of fashion—and American women generally—are unswerving in their liking for tailored clothes. For variety's sake they welcome any new development in the tailored mode, as the success of the coat-dress and one-piece tailored dress attest, but they never entirely neglect the two-piece suit.

An important addition to the tailored group arrived this fall when the ensemble suit made its appearance. These are suits which are made up of coat and dress or coat, skirt and blouse, or coat, tunic and skirt, which in any case are made as companion pieces; that is, they employ the same materials. The coat and dress combination has proved most popular. While the object of the ensemble is to provide a coat in harmony with the garments worn under it, each may be worn without the other—the coat serving other dresses and the dresses or tunic, blouse and skirt combinations used independently of the coat.

Typical Ensemble Suit.

The usual suitings and certain novelties in cloths, as well as satin, corded silks and the heavier crepe weaves, are used for these newcomers in the tailored mode. A popular development consists of a coat in a plain fabric lined with a plaid material, and a dress made of the same plaid—or of the plaid in combination with a plain fabric. Or a coat of novelty fabric lined with plain crepe de chine, and these two combined in a dress or tunic and skirt—or coat and skirt to match with a contrasting blouse. As the ensemble lends itself to the dressy type of suit, very handsome coats and skirts to match are provided with rich blouses of metallic cloths or brocade in formal suits.

Heavy crepe or corded silk or velours might be used for the suit pictured, or any of the fine, smooth-faced suitings in wool. Banded trimmings, made of the fabric, narrow fur bandings or embroidered bands are available for trimming it. Some of the last models shown are made of velveteen.

Of all seasons autumn seems the most alluring to horsewomen—at any rate many of them are abroad in country roads and city bridle paths. And it is [illegible] habit that passes muster as well as the latest arrival.

But it is the late arrivals that need introduction. First, and most popular, are the sturdy suits of tweed in two pieces, breeches and coat. They are worn with soft felt hats, or for young girls either felt or tweed hat may be chosen. Plain shirtwaist, four-in-hand tie and tan riding boots complete an ensemble that is sure of approval and merits it anywhere. But for some women occasion calls for dressier habits. Autumn brings for their benefit habits of dark oxford gray melton cloth which is made up in two or three-piece suits.

The three-piece suit includes a wrapped skirt, called a "shell skirt," for those who choose to ride side-saddle, and is worn over the breeches. With this a high hat, of hatters' plush, is the proper headwear. With the two-piece suit, straight English coat and breeches of oxford gray, or dark brown cloth the tricorn, in hatters' plush, is recommended, and it has a brim facing of faille silk. All the tan and brown shades are approved in habits, and a smart combination appears in brown bedford cord breeches with coat of tan smooth-faced cloth, worn with soft, brown felt hat and tan boots. It is an adaptable combination, fitting in with either city or country background.

Deep Cherry Pie.

Line a deep earthen dish with a good pastry and invert in the center a china tea cup. Take three pints of ripe cherries, cover with sugar, one or more cupfuls to sweeten. The fruit should rise over the top of the cup and form a mound in the dish. Cover with pastry, wetting the edges and pressing them down well. No openings are made in the crust. Bake at least an hour. At serving time cut the crust into eighths, remove the teacup and serve a portion of the rich red juice with a segment of the crisp crust. Whipped cream may be served if desired.

Cabbage With Cheese.

Cook cabbage until tender, arrange a layer in a baking dish, cover with white sauce and a layer of rich cheese grated, repeat and finish the top with buttered crumbs, bake until the crumbs are brown.

The ideal life is in our blood and never will be still. Sad will be the day for any man when he becomes contented with the thoughts he is thinking and the deeds he is doing—where there is not forever beating at the doors of his soul some great desire to do something larger, which he knows he is meant to do.—Phillips Brooks.

EVERYDAY GOOD THINGS

The plain ordinary food is more important to us, as it is the kind which is served daily in millions of homes. Careful seasoning and nice serving makes an ordinary dish, though plain attractive.

Veal Savory.—Cut meat from a veal soup bone into pieces twice the size of the finger. Place the meat in the kettle, which has been well greased. Grate an onion and one carrot, add one-half cupful of boiling water, salt and pepper to season, and pour over the meat. On top place a bay leaf, lay the bone over this, sprinkle with flour and cover tightly. Set in a slow oven for three hours. When done remove the bone, allowing the marrow to drip over the meat. Serve with rice or mashed potatoes.

Mock Venison.—Hang a leg of mutton in a cool place to ripen as long as possible, while it keeps sweet. Take off the skin and put the mutton into a dripping pan or kettle and pour over the following: Take three heads of garlic or three sliced onions, one-half ounce of peppercorns, one-fourth ounce of allspice crushed, six bay leaves, a dozen sprigs of thyme, the same of parsley, all brought to a boil in three cupfuls of vinegar. Rub this into the meat, rubbing and turning for thirty minutes. Allow the meat to remain in the pickle, covering the meat with thinly-sliced onions until the next day, then repeat the rubbing, turn and cover the other side with onions. Continue this for four days, then wipe the meat dry, rub for half an hour with a pint of hot molasses. Let the meat hang in a cool place until the next day, then wipe dry and roast the same as a leg of mutton. Serve with melted currant jelly. This is some work, but the results are worth it.

Cauliflower With Cheese Sauce.—Cook the imperfect heads until tender, break up into flowerets and serve in a rich white sauce to which a half cupful of grated cheese has been added.

Oysters Louisiane.—Clean and parboil one quart of oysters, reserving the liquor, adding water to make one and one-half cupfuls. Cook three tablespoonfuls of butter with two tablespoonfuls of chopped red pepper and one-half of a tablespoonful of chopped onion. Bring to the boiling point and season with salt, paprika, cayenne and a tablespoonful of orange juice. Arrange in buttered shells, pour over the sauce and sprinkle with parmesan cheese.

The afternoon wore on, and as the day was warm she dismounted by a pool and sat down upon a flat rock close to the water. The rock reminded her of the one on which she and Grant had sat that night while the dim red lines of fire played far up and down the valley. Her ankle was paining a little so she removed her boot and stocking and soothed it in the cool water.

As she sat watching her reflection in the clear stream and toying with the ripple about her foot a horseman rode quickly down through the cottonwoods on the other side and plunged into the ford. It happened so quickly that neither saw the other until he was well into the river. Although she had had no dream of seeing him here, in some way she felt no surprise. Her heart was behaving boisterously, but she sat outwardly demure, and when he was close enough she sent a frank smile up to him. The look on his sunburned face as he returned her greeting convinced her that the meeting, on his part, was no less unexpected and welcome than it was to her.

When his horse was out of the water he dismounted and walked to her with extended hand.

"This is an unexpected pleasure," he said. "How is the ankle progressing?"

"Well enough," she returned, "but it gets tired as the day wears on. I am just resting a bit."

There was a moment of somewhat embarrassed silence.

"That is a good-sized rock," he suggested, at length.

"Yes, isn't it? And here in the shade, at that."

She did not invite him with words, but she gave her body a slight hitch, as though to make room, although there was enough already. He sat down without comment.

"Not unlike a rock I remember up in the foothills," he remarked, after a silence.

"Oh, you remember that? It was like this, wasn't it?"

"Same two people sitting on it."

". . . Yes."

"Not like this, though."

"No. . . . You're mean. You know I didn't intend to fall asleep."

"Of course not. Still. . . ."

His voice lingered on it as though it were a delightful remembrance.

She found herself holding one of her hands in the other. She could feel the pressure of Transley's ring on her palm, and she held it tighter still.

"Riding anywhere in particular?" he inquired.

"No. Just mooning." She looked up at him again, this time at close quarters. It was a quick, bright flash on his face—a moment only.

"Why mooning?"

She did not answer. Looking down in the water he met her gaze there.

"You're troubled!" he exclaimed.

"Oh, no! My—my ankle hurts a little."

He looked at her sympathetically. "But not that much," he said.

She gave a forced little laugh. "What a mind reader you are! Can you tell my fortune?"

"I should have to read it in your hand."

She would have extended her hand, but for Transley's ring.

"No. . . . No. You'll have to read it in—in the stars."

"Then look at me." She did so, innocently.

"I cannot read it there," he said, after his long gaze had begun to whip the color to her cheeks. "There is no answer."

She turned again to the water, and after a long while she heard his voice, very low and earnest.

"Zen, I could read a fortune for you, if you would not be offended. We are only chance acquaintances—not very well acquainted, yet—"

She knew what he meant, but she pretended she did not. Even in that moment something came to her of Transley's speech about love being a game of pretense. Very well, she would play the game—this once.

"I don't see how I could be offended at your reading my fortune," she murmured.

"Then this is the fortune I would read for you," he said boldly. "I see a young man, a rather foolish young man, perhaps, by ordinary standards, and yet one who has found a great deal of happiness in his simple, unconventional life. Until a short time ago he felt that life could give him all the happiness that was worth having. He had health, strength, hours of work and hours of pleasure, the fields, the hills, the mountains, the sky—all God's open places to live in and enjoy. He thought there was nothing more.

"Well, then he found, all of a sudden, that there was something more—everything more. He made that discovery on a calm autumn night, when fire had blackened all the foothills and still ran in dancing red ribbons over their distant crests. That night a great thing—two great things—came into his life. First was something he gave. Not very much, indeed, but typical of all it might be. It was service. And next was something he received, something so wonderful he did not understand it then, and does not understand it yet. It was trust. These were things he had been leaving largely out of his life, and suddenly he discovered how empty it was. I think there is one word for both these things, and, it may be, for even more. You know?"

"I know," she said, and her voice was scarcely audible.

"But it is your fortune I am to read," he corrected himself. "It has been your fortune to open that new world to me. That can never be undone—those gates can never be closed—no matter where the paths may lead. Those two paths go down to the future—as all paths must—even as this road leads away through the valley to the sunset. Zen—if only, like this road, they could run side by side to the sunset—Oh! Zen, if they could?"

"I know," she said, and as she raised her face he saw that her eyes were wet. "I know—if only they could!"

There was a little sob in her voice, and in her beauty and distress she was altogether irresistible. He reached out his arms and would have taken her in them, but she thrust her hands in his and held herself back. She turned the diamond deliberately to his eyes. She could feel his grip relax and apparently grow suddenly cold. He stood speechless, like one dazed—benumbed.

"You see, I should not have let you talk—it is my fault," she said, speaking hurriedly. "I should not have let you talk. Please do not think I am shallow; that I let you suffer to gratify my vanity." Her eyes found his again. "If I had not believed every word you said—if I had not—hoped—every word you said, I would not have listened. . . . But you see how it is."

He was silent for so long that she thought he was not going to answer her at all. When he spoke it was in a dry, parched voice.

"I beg your pardon," he said. "I should not have presumed—"

"I know, I know. If only—"

Then he looked straight at her and talked out.

"You liked me enough to let me speak as I did. I opened my heart to you. I ask no such concession in return. I hope you will not think me presumptuous, but I do not plead now for my happiness, but for yours. Is this irrevocable? Are—you—sure?"

"I Must Go," She Said.

He said the last words so slowly and deliberately that she felt that each of them was cutting the very rock from underneath her. She knew she was at a junction point in her life, and her mind strove to quickly appraise the situation. On one side was this man who had for her so strange and so powerful an appeal. It was only by sheer force of will that she could hold herself aloof from him. But he was a man who had broken with his family and quarreled with her father—a man whom her father would certainly not for a moment consider as a son-in-law. He was a foreman; practically a ranch hand. Neither Zen nor her father were snobs, and if Grant worked for a living, so did Transley. That was not to be counted against him. The point was, what kind of living did he earn? What Transley had to offer was perhaps on a lower plane, but it was more substantial. It had been approved by her father, and her mother, and herself. It wasn't as though one man were good and the other bad; it wasn't as though one thing were right and the other wrong. It would have been easy then. . . .

"I have promised," she said at last.

She released her hands from his, and, sitting down, silently put on her stocking and boot. She was aware that he was still standing near, as though waiting to be formally dismissed. She walked by him to her horse and put her foot in the stirrup. Then she looked at him and gave her hand a little farewell wave.

Then a great pang, irresistible in its yearning, swept over her. She drew her foot from the stirrup, and, rushing down, threw her arms about his neck. . . .

"I must go," she said. "I must go. We must both go and forget."

And Dennison Grant continued his way down the valley while Zen rode back to the Y.D., wondering if she could ever forget.

CHAPTER IX

Linder scratched his tousled brown hair reflectively as he gazed after the retreating form of Transley. His hat was off, and the perspiration stood on his sunburned face—a face which, in point of handsomeness, needed make no apology to Transley.

"Well, by thunder!" said Linder; "by thunder, think of that!"

Linder stood for some time, thinking "of that" as deeply as his somewhat disorganized mental state would permit. For Transley had announced, with his usual directness, that he wanted so many men and teams for a house excavation in the most exclusive part of the city. So far they had been building in the cheaper districts a cheap type of house for those who, having little capital, are the easier deprived of what they have. The shift in operations caused Linder to lift his eyebrows.

Transley laughed boyishly and clapped a palm on his shoulder.

"I may as well make you wise, Linder," he said. "We're going to build a house for Mr. and Mrs. Transley."

"Missus?" Linder echoed, incredulously.

"That's the good word," Transley confirmed. "Never expected it to happen to me, but it did, all of a sudden. You want to look out; maybe it's catching."

Transley was evidently in prime humor. Linder had, indeed, noted this good humor for some time, but had attributed it to the very successful operations in which his employer had been engaged. He pulled himself together enough to offer a somewhat confused congratulation.

"And may I ask who is to be the fortunate young lady?" he ventured.

"You may," said Transley, "but if you could see the length of your nose it wouldn't be necessary. Linder, you're the best foreman I ever had. Just because you don't ever think of anything else. When you pass on there'll be no heaven for you unless they give you charge of a bunch of men and teams where you can raise a sweat and make money for the boss. If you weren't like that you would have anticipated what I've told you—or perhaps made a play for Zen yourself."

"Zen? You don't mean Y.D.'s daughter?"

"If I don't mean Y.D.'s daughter I don't mean anybody, and you can take that from me. You bet it's Zen. Say, Linder, I didn't think I could go silly over a girl, but I'm plumb locoed. I bought the biggest old sparkler in this town and sent it out with Y.D., if he didn't lose it through the lining of his vest—he handled it like it might have been a box of pills—bad pills, Linder—I've got an architect figuring how much expense he can put on a house—he gets a commission on the cost, you see—and one of these nights I'm going to buy you a dinner that'll keep you fed till Christmas. I never knew before that silliness and happiness go together, but they do. I'm glad I've got a sober old foreman—that's all that keeps the business going."

And after Transley had turned away Linder had scratched his head and said, "By thunder. . . . Linder, when you wake up you'll be dead. . . . After her practically saying, 'The water's fine.' . . . Well, that's why I'm a foreman, and always will be."

But after a little reflection Linder came to the conclusion that perhaps it was all for the best. He could not have bought Y.D.'s daughter a big sparkler or have built her a fine home—because he was a foreman. It was a round circle. . . . He threw himself into the building of Transley's house with as much fidelity as if it had been his own. He gave his undivided attention to Transley's interests, making dollars for him while earning cents for himself. This attention was more needed than it ever had been, as Transley found it necessary to make weekly trips to the ranch in the foothills to consult with Y.D. upon business matters.

Zen found her interest in Transley growing as his attentions continued. He spent money upon her lavishly, to the point at which she protested, for although Y.D. was rated as a millionaire the family life was one of almost stark simplicity. Transley assured her that he was making money faster than he possibly could spend it, and even if not, money had no nobler mission than to bring her happiness. He explained the blue-prints of the house, and discussed with her details of the appointments. As the building progressed he brought her weekly photographs of it. He urged her to set the date about Christmas; during the winter contracting would be at a standstill, so they would spend three months in California and return in time for the spring business.

Day by day the girl turned the situation over in her mind. Her life had been swept into strange and unexpected channels, and the experience puzzled her. She assured herself that she looked forward to her marriage with Transley with the proper delight of a bride-to-be, and indeed it was a prospect that could well be contemplated with pleasure. . . . Transley had won the complete confidence of her father and when doubts assailed her Zen found in that fact a very considerable comfort. Y.D. was a shrewd man; a man who seldom guessed wrong. Zen did not admit that she was allowing her father to choose a husband for her, but the fact that her father concurred in the choice strengthened her in it. Transley had in him qualities which would win not only wealth, but distinction, and she would share in the laurels. She told herself that it was a delightful outlook; that she was a very happy girl indeed—and wondered why she was not happier!

Particularly she laid it upon herself that she must now, finally, dismiss Dennison Grant from her mind. It was absurd to suppose that she cared more for Grant than she did for Transley. The two men were so different; it was impossible to make comparisons. They occupied quite different spheres in her regard. To be sure, Grant was a very likeable man, but he was not eligible as a husband, and she could not marry two, in any case. Zen entertained no girlish delusions about there being only one man in the world. On the contrary, she was convinced that there were very many men in the world, and, among the better types, there was, perhaps, not so much to choose between them. Grant would undoubtedly be a good husband within his means; so would Transley, and his means were greater. The blue-prints of the new house in town had not been without their effect. It was a different prospect from being a foreman's wife on a ranch. Her father would never hear of it. . . .

So she busied herself with preparations for the great event, and what preparations they were! "Zen," her father had said, "for once the lid is off. Go the limit!" She took him at his word. There were many trips to town, and activities about the old ranch buildings such as they had never known since Jessie Wilson came to finish Y.D.'s up-bringing, nor even then. The good word spread throughout the foothill country and down over the prairies, and many a lazy cloud of dust lay along the November hillsides as the women folk of neighboring ranches came to pay their respects and gratify their curiosity. Zen had treasures to show which sent them home with new standards of extravagance.

Y.D. had not thought he could become so worked up over a simple matter like a wedding. Time had dulled the edge of memory, but even after making allowances he could not recall that his marriage to Jessie Wilson had been such an event in his life as this. It did not at least reflect so much glory upon him personally. He basked in the reflected glow of his daughter's beauty and popularity as happily as the big cat lying on the sunny side of the bunk-house. He found all sorts of excuses for invading where his presence was little wanted while Zen's finery was being displayed for admiration. Y.D. always pretended that such invasions were quite accidental, and affected a fine indifference to all this "women's fuss an' feathers," but his affectations deceived at least none of the older visitors.

As the great day approached Y.D.'s wife shot a bomb-shell at him. "What do you propose to wear for Zen's wedding?" she demanded.

"What's the matter with the suit I go to town in?"

"Y.D.," said his wife, kindly, "there are certain little touches which you overlook. Your town suit is all right for selling steers, although I won't say that it hasn't outlived its prime even for that. To attend Zen's wedding it is—hardly the thing."

"It's been a good suit," he protested. "It is—

"It has. It is also a venerable suit. But really, Y.D., it will not do for this occasion. You must get yourself a new suit, and a white shirt—"

"What do I want with a white shirt?"

"It has to be," his wife insisted. "You'll have to deck yourself out in a new suit and a white shirt and collar."

Y.D. stamped around the room, and in a moment slipped out. "All fool nonsense," he confided to himself, on his way to the bunk-house. "It's all right for Zen to have good clothes—didn't I tell her to go the limit?—but as for me, 't ain't me that's gettin' married, is it? Standin' up before all them cow punchers in a white shirt!" The bitterness of such disgrace cut the old rancher no less keenly than the physical discomfort which he forecast for himself, yet he put his own desires sufficiently to one side to buy a suit of clothes, and a white shirt and collar, when he was next in town.

It must not be supposed that Y.D. admitted to the salesman that he personally was descending to any such garb.

Immense Waterspout

A Washington scientist has recorded the particulars concerning a great waterspout he observed south of Cape Comorin on a day when the weather was fine and the sea smooth. The waterspout formed between a russet-gray cloud and the sea nearly five miles from the ship. At first the distance between the base of the cloud and the surface of the sea was 4,600 feet and the width of the column tapered from 500 feet at its juncture with the cloud to 150 feet at the sea.

The vortex appeared to be a tube with tapering sides and a central column. The walls seemed to consist of water moving downward and the central column of water ascending. The phenomenon lasted for thirteen minutes. The walls broke and the central column appeared to ascend into the cloud.

THE PARABLE OF THE SOWER

LESSON TEXT—Mark 4:1-20.

GOLDEN TEXT—The sower soweth the word.—Mark 4:14.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Garden of the Heart.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Good Soil for Good Seed.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—How to Receive and Use God's Word.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—How May I Improve the Soil of My Heart?

The method of teaching by parables was not employed by Jesus until the rulers had set their hearts against Him. When, in the light of His wonderful works, they turned against Him and attributed His works to the Devil (Mark 3:22) He denounced them in scathing terms and began to teach them by parables in fulfillment of Isaiah 6:10. The parabolic method of teaching makes clear the truth to those who love it and conceals it from those who dislike it.

A great multitude gathered to Him at the seaside (v. 1), so that, in order to escape the pressure of the crowd, He was obliged to enter a boat. From the boat as a pulpit He taught many things in parables. In this parable the sower and the seed are the same in all instances, but the results are entirely different. The difference lies in the condition of the soil. The central purpose of the teaching of this parable is to show that the results of preaching the Word depend upon the condition of the human heart.

I. The Wayside (vv. 4; 15).

The wayside means the track beaten down by the hoofs of animals and the feet of men. Because the soil was unbroken and uncultivated the seed could not get beneath the surface, therefore was devoured by the fowls that came along (v. 4). The great truth taught here is that the heart unbroken and hard is not fit soil for the Gospel. Such a heart it penetrates not, but lies loosely upon the surface. It is not recognized as God's means for restoring them unto Himself. While in this condition the evil one finds some way to snatch away the truth. The fowls that devour the seed represent the agents of Satan (v. 15).

II. The Stony Ground (vv. 5, 6; 16, 17).

This means not stones mixed with soil, but stones with a thin layer of soil on them. With such conditions a seed springs up quickly and likewise scorches quickly, as it has not much depth. The great lesson is that hearts superficially impressed receive the Word with joy, but when affliction or persecution arises for the Word's sake, immediately they are offended. They wither away and die.

III. The Thorny Ground (vv. 7; 18, 19).

In this case the ground is good, but has thorns in it. It is mellow enough and has sufficient depth, but has not been cleaned of the thorns. Such really hear the Word, but "the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in, choke the Word, and it becometh unfruitful" (v. 19). The thorny ground hearers of this age are those:

1. Who are so immersed in worldliness, business and anxious cares that the good seed cannot mature.

2. Who are rich. Anxious care in business brings riches and the effect of riches is to blunt the spiritual perception of men and women, thereby rendering them unsusceptible to the call of God, to higher things in life.

3. Who are running after the pleasures of life. All these things choke the Word. Many of the enjoyments of the world may be innocent in themselves, but they attract so much attention and consume so much energy and time that one has not time for Bible reading, meditation and prayer.

IV. The Good Ground (vv. 8; 20).

This ground differs from all the rest. It is soft and mellow, deep and moist; therefore, is capable of bringing forth fruit, some an hundred, some sixty and some thirty-fold, indicating different degrees of fruitfulness even of the good ground. In the measure that the heart is kept free from worldliness, riches and pleasure, the good seed matures.

Blaming Nature

You fall into the very common mistake of charging upon nature matters with which she has not the smallest connection, and for which she is in no way responsible. Men talk of nature as an abstract thing, and lose sight of what is natural while they do so.—Dickens.

WHEREAS, the Legislature of Alabama, at a session held in 1923, has ordered an election by the qualified electors of the State of Alabama upon a certain proposed amendment to the Constitution of Alabama, which is herein set forth, to be held at the general election in November, 1924, and

WHEREAS, Notice of such election, together with the proposed amendment, is required by law to be given by proclamation of the Governor:

Brandon, Governor of the State of Alabama, do hereby give notice, direct and proclaim that at the general election in November, 1924, an election will be held for the vote of the qualified electors of the State of Alabama, in the manner, form and places required by law, upon the following amendment to the Constitution of Alabama, viz:

"The municipalities of Thorsby, Piedmont and Greenville, and Roanoke and Greensboro and Calera, Florala and Opp, Evergreen and Fayette, and Clayton and Clio in the State of Alabama, shall have the power and right to levy and collect a tax of one-half of one per centum in any one year on property situated therein, based on the valuation of such property as assessed for state taxation for the tax year ending on the 30th day of September next succeeding the levy; provided, that for the purpose of paying bonds or indebtedness issued and outstanding at the time of the adoption of this amendment and the interest thereon, and for the purpose of paying bonds or indebtedness which may be issued or incurred after the adoption of this amendment and the interest thereon, an additional tax of one-half of one per centum may be levied and collected by said corporations; provided further, that a majority of the qualified electors of any of said municipal corporations voting at an election called for that purpose may vote a special tax not to exceed one-half of one percentum in any one year for any special purpose or purposes, which tax shall be used only for the purpose or purposes for which same is levied and collected; provided, however, that the total tax to be levied by any of said municipal corporations shall not exceed one and one-half (1 1-2) per centum in any one year. Alabama City shall have the power and right to levy and collect a tax of three-quarters of one per centum in any one year on property situated therein, based on the valuation of such property as assessed for state taxation. Provided, further, that the adoption of this amendment shall in no wise affect, limit, modify, abridge or impair the power, authority or right of either of said municipal corporations to levy and collect the special school taxes, now or hereafter vested in or conferred upon them, or any of them, under the Constitution or any amendment thereto, including the power of the City of Selma to levy and collect the taxes for schools and school purposes vested in and conferred upon said City of Selma by the amendment to the Constitution of Alabama adopted thereto at the general election held in November, 1916, and which was submitted under law Number 315, General Laws 1915, page 337, each election held under the provisions hereof shall be ordered, held, canvassed and may be contested in the same manner as is or may be provided by the law applicable to the municipal corporations for elections to authorize the issuance of municipal bonds. If You Need a Medicine You Should Have the Best--Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root

Have you ever stopped to reason why it is that so many products that are extensively advertised all at once drop out of sight and are soon forgotten? The reason is plain—the article did not fulfill the promises of the manufacturer. This applies more particularly to a medicine. A medicinal preparation that has real curative value almost sells itself, as like an endless chain system the remedy is recommended by those who have been benefited to those who are in need of it.

A prominent druggist says, "Take for example Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, a preparation I have sold for many years and never hesitate to recommend, for in almost every case it shows excellent results, as many of my customers testify. No other kidney remedy has so large a sale."

According to sworn statements and verified testimony of thousands who have used the preparation, the success of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is due to the fact, so many people claim, that it fulfills almost every wish in overcoming kidney, liver and bladder ailments, corrects urinary troubles and neutralizes the uric acid which causes rheumatism.

You may receive a sample bottle of Swamp-Root by parcel post. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., and enclose ten cents; also mention this paper. Large and medium size bottles for sale at all drug stores.—Advertisement.

Forbear to mention what you cannot praise.

Light and Operate Swedish Farms by Current

Stockholm.—While the utilization of water power for every purpose has been developing rapidly in Sweden during the last two decades, there is a strong tendency at present to convert the turbine power into electric energy for further industrial use. Thus factories are being built hundreds of miles away from the source of their power, and electric current is not only distributed to all parts of Sweden, but is exported to neighboring countries as well.

There are now 2,100 large power plants in Sweden, of which about 50 per cent furnish light, heat and power for the country districts. Besides, there are several hundred smaller plants using less than 10,000 horsepower each.

Forty per cent of the Swedish farms now run their household, dairy, and agricultural machinery by electricity, and 50 per cent of the houses in the country districts are lighted by electricity. This is believed to be a record for the world.

WOMEN OF MIDDLE AGE

Praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

"A Blessing to Suffering Women," Writes One

Louisville, Illinois.—"I certainly thank you for the great benefit I have received from taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I first learned about it from my step-mother who got so much help from it. Several years ago I took it for inward weakness and since then I have taken it during the Change of Life and it has been a great help to me. It certainly is a blessing to suffering women and I take pleasure in recommending it. My health has been better this summer than it has been for five years. I am now able to do all my work and have canned 340 quarts of fruit and vegetables this summer."—Mrs. KATE MCPEAK, Louisville, Illinois.

Wants Letter Used As Proof

Frankford, Pennsylvania.—"I am sure if women who suffer through the Change of Life as I have, with hot flashes, nervousness and other weaknesses, would give Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial they would be benefited as I was. My nerves were so bad that every little noise made me jump, but now I am not bothered that way at all. My husband says he really hated to look at me I looked so miserable. I hope you will use this letter as proof of the help the Vegetable Compound is giving me."—Mrs. ABBIE HARVEY, 5701 Leonard St., Frankford, Pa.

Forced To Remain in Bed

Carlisle, Illinois.—"During the Change of Life I suffered with severe nervousness and with disturbances of the entire system. These continued probably two years before I began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I could do none of my work and was not always able to be up. For ten days at a time I was forced to remain in bed with my hips propped higher than my head and the pains were terrible. The doctor helped some but each time I was forced to go over the same suffering. I had taken the Vegetable Compound in 1910 after my twins were born and it had helped me so I decided to try it again. I became better and gained in strength. I have taken it for about three years now but not steadily. I am able to do my housework but I avoid all heavy lifting and washing and ironing as I know I am not strong enough yet. I give the Vegetable Compound to my daughters and recommend it to my friends."—Mrs. LOUISA B. BRAND, 450 Fairfax Street, Carlyle, Illinois.

In a recent country-wide canvass of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, over 100,000 replies were received and 98 out of every 100 reported they had been benefited by its use. For sale by druggists everywhere.

The Silent Motorcycle

The noise and vibration of the motorcycle are two features which have worked somewhat to the detriment of this mode of travel. But these objectionable features seem to have been overcome by a motorcycle design which has been recently shown in England. The noise is eliminated by entirely inclosing the engine of the transmission and several new features are introduced to overcome the vibration. As a test recently, a motorcycle of the new design and a standard automobile were driven toward an observer on the roadside. The latter heard the automobile at 134 yards, but the motorcycle approached within 70 yards before its noise was noticed.

Arsenal Unearthed

Twenty-two rusting and rotting muzzle-loading muskets and several copper sabers were unearthed in a sandstone cave on a small island to miles from the mainland by Emerson Wray, a blue fox farmer. The weapons are believed to have been hidden by a landing party of Russians who acted as hijackers against sealers in the early days of Alaska's Asiatic history.

"Prose" and "Pro's"

In sporting matters the average boy's erudition is aptly illustrated by a story a certain educator is fond of telling. A teacher was trying to explain to a group of youngsters the respective properties of poetry and prose. Her audience was rather bored but she thought she caught a glimpse of understanding on one boy's face. Brightly turning to him she said, "Now, Tommy, give me one definition of prose." "People who get paid for playing golf," was the answer which proved enigmatic to the teacher.

GOOD ROADS

ROAD CONSTRUCTION IS GREAT PROBLEM

The growth of "the good roads movement" in the United States and Canada since its organized inception in 1880, and with the great stimulus it received in the periods immediately following the advent of the automobile and the appearance of the motor truck, has been so rapid, so extensive and so effective that highway construction today constitutes one of the greatest, if not the greatest, problem in American economic life.

There are now 1,702 organized agencies actively and directly pleading the cause of good roads. The agitation, to date, has brought about the construction of 310,000 miles of surfaced highways—raising the highway mileage of the United States to 2,478,552, and that of Canada to 255,000.

The automobile industry, fourth largest in the country, with 368 manufacturing plants, capitalized at $1,204,378,642, employing 325,000 workmen, having an annual output of 2,205,197 passenger cars and trucks valued at $3,594,814,620, and supplemented as it is by 1910 firms producing auto parts valued at $300,000,000 a year, together with 1,000 firms manufacturing annually 35,000,000 tires valued at $1,000,000,000, is absolutely dependent upon highway improvement for its stability and upon increased road mileage for greater expansion. In addition, 33,000 distributors of automobiles are involved, as well as 45,800 dealers in automobile accessories and 45,600 dealers in tires. So great, too, has the road-building industry become, in consequence of the demand for improved roads, that 7,500 contracting firms are now engaged in actual construction work. The roads are now traversed by 9,211,295 licensed cars and trucks, of which 3,000,000 are used on the farms.

Prior to 1880, when Amos G. Batchelder, late chairman of the executive board of the American Automobile association at Washington, with H. S. Earle of Detroit and other pioneer advocates, organized the League of American Wheelmen, and began a systematic campaign, a good roads enthusiast was looked upon with undisguised curiosity or amusement as something of a "nut"—a loquacious, but no doubt well-meaning person, who might be seen, but not heard. Usually he was promptly "sat down upon" by the lugubrious taxpayer.

Opposition gradually melted away, however, as the campaign became more fully organized and extended. Since 1880 more than $3,000,000,000 has been spent for highway improvement in the United States and Canada. More than $1,300,000,000 is now available, and $1,500,000,000 additional will be necessary to carry out projects under contemplation. And yet, with all this, only a beginning has been made. Billions more must be expended before the country has anything like a highway system adequate to the traffic needs—C. S. Lee, Director Highways Information Service, New York city.

New Peruvian Road Will Stimulate Use of Truck

Completion of a 12-kilometer highway between Callao and Lima should do much to stimulate motor transportation in Peru, says Consul C. E. Guyant in a report from Callao. Callao is the principal port of entry in the country, and over 60 per cent of the total imports pass through that harbor. A large share of these imports is taken to Lima for distribution throughout the republic. The present means of transportation is by two-wheeled carts or by the railroad. The haul being so short, it is expected that auto trucks will replace the old style of transportation to a large extent and auto dealers are looking forward to the opening of the road with considerable anticipation.

Good Roads Notes

Endurance under extremes of heat and cold is one of the severe tests of pavement. In Bismarck, N. Dak., the maximum temperature recorded is 108 degrees, while the lowest temperature on record for the city is 45 degrees below zero. Concrete pavement in Bismarck has stood this test successfully.

* * *

One of the great blessings to rural communities, made possible by good roads, is the consolidated school. In 1918 the United States bureau of education reported 10,500 consolidated schools in the country. This total has been considerably increased since then, as the movement is rapidly gaining in popularity.

* * *

Because of the increased congestion in automobile traffic the Boston Post road from the New York state line to New Haven, Conn., is to be widened from its present width of about 18 feet to 36 feet. It is to be among the broadest highways in the country.

Bids for 235 miles of highway improvement work, with 24 new bridge and bridge alteration projects, to be let by the Minnesota state highway commission, indicate the state is pushing ahead fast on its highway improvement program.

MARY SUCCEEDS ON MAIN STREET

By LAURA MILLER

© by Laura Miller

POLICING MAIN STREET

The very shortest skirt I saw worn on a woman the year short skirts were worn was not swishing down Broadway. Nor was it on the stage. It was flitting along the main street of Sioux Falls, S. D. "Look at her," exclaimed a member of the Rotary club, "She's probably just in from the country and covering an immense ignorance with that show of sophistication. She'll be in trouble within a month, if I'm any good at guessing. But there doesn't seem to be much a man can do to help her kind."

Wherefore it is that the city of Sioux Falls has a woman on the job. Her name is Lucy Borneman. Her title is police matron. Her interest in her work is vital. It came to her attention that inexperienced young girls, who perhaps had only slipped as far as a little shoplifting, were sometimes taken into courtroom filled with men and asked vile questions. And that these same girls were stripped by men searchers in the name of law and justice.

She began to study the ways of the girls and of the men who offered the "help" that my honest friend of the Rotary confessed was so hard to give in the form of palatable advice and honest jobs with their due meed of drudgery. "They are usually girls without much money," says Mrs. Borneman. "And perhaps they hadn't realized what it costs to live in town where everything requires cash. A man who is on the watch takes advantage and offers the needed money. Then she is under obligation to him and is easy prey if he is an immoral man.

"Sioux Falls has only 37,000 population, but according to our numbers we have all the troubles that New York has, and we have to handle them much the same way. I have one policewoman, two dance-hall matrons, and three park matrons. So far this year (this was in June) I have handled personally 200 cases. This of course does not cover all I come in contact with. All our officials are good about helping; without their assistance it would be impossible to accomplish much."

It was because I had met Mrs. Borneman and knew the spirit behind her work that I chose her from the many who are policing our towns and cities. And as to whether such work is the thing a woman would choose to prepare herself for—"I have been police matron here for over ten years," says Mrs. Borneman, "and I know of no work that would be more interesting."

IF YOU WANT TO WRITE

If you want to write, do newspaper work, is the stereotyped advice to folks who have the desire but not enough of the know-how to plunge in. Which newspaper and where, is the usual retort, with a trailer, "How can I get on a New York daily, so as to have the guidance of a great editor?" To which the answer, from those who know the game, is equally stereotyped, "Don't!"

Of the people who know how, one might take Lessie Stringfellow Read, whose name appears in the better magazines, and who has the courage to refuse editorial positions in New York and Washington. Mrs. Read has discovered the fascination of doing the big work from the little place. As editor of the Fayetteville Daily Democrat, she likes being friends with "everybody from the corner policeman to the mayor, the very rich and the very poor, the business man and his methods. All this permits the small-town editor to make the more intimate study of character that is invaluable to a writer."

She likes being volunteer editor of the General Federation News, which she founded. That official organ of 2,000,000 club women has given "acquaintance with the leading women in every state and a dozen foreign lands." And she likes the opportunity—which is better in Arkansas than in New York—of being correspondent for "the great press services, one national daily, and four large metropolitan papers, in addition to magazine and feature writing."

Can any one else do as well from a far corner of Main Street? Let Mrs. Read answer:

"I would advise any girl who wants to take up journalism to begin on the society column of a small-town paper. She should study newspaper methods, read a good book on journalism and editing and reporting, keep her eyes and ears, open for the 'big beat' and surprise her editor with good regular news stories.

"After beginning to do regular news reporting, she should get to be correspondent from her home town for as many newspapers as possible, in this way broadening her field. Later if she wishes a job in a city she can usually get one on the city papers she has written for. I would not advise her to go to the big city until she has had years of experience, and not then until the job seeks her, which it will if she has grown to it."

MEMPHIS MAN GAINS 40 LBS. ON TANLAC

Jenkins Gives Medicine Credit for Recovery.

"Tanlac knocked out my troubles and gave me such a fine appetite and digestion that I have put on 40 lbs. of good, solid weight," declared W. A. Jenkins, popular street railway conductor, 1007 Kirkland St., Memphis, Tenn.

"For several years stomach trouble, malaria, nervousness, dizzy spells and sick headaches kept me all out of gear. I couldn't eat right, my sleep was all broken and it was all I could do to keep on the job.

"Since taking Tanlac I eat everything, sleep good and feel fine all the time. I have found Tanlac is the very thing for keeping my system toned up and in trim. Tanlac has also relieved my mother of stomach trouble. It's the best ever in the way of a medicine."

Cotton
Is Going to Market.

All over the cotton belt, loading platforms are piled high with "the staple of the South"; ready for shipment to the mills. The 1924 crop will bring millions of dollars to the growers, and the distribution of this money will benefit everybody.

Just at this time it is interesting to remember that U. S. Department of Agriculture figures for last year show that the average farm price paid to the producer for 100 pounds of cotton, was $27.80; whereas, the railroads received an average of 66c for hauling each 100 pounds to market.

These figures indicate that in cotton, as in all other commodities, the freight rate represents a relatively small percentage of the cost, and is not a controlling factor in the determination of prices.

The Louisville & Nashville Railroad directly serves more than half of the cotton-producing states; its tonnage during 1923 totaling approximately 9,000 cars.

FISH AND GAME ASSN. FOR SHELBY COUNTY FORMED SATURDAY

The Shelby County Fish and Game Protective Association was organized at a meeting held at the court house Saturday afternoon and attended by representative citizens from different parts of the county.

Officers of the association were elected as follows: T. K. Self of Roebuck, president; L. L. Saxon of Columbiana and Solon McNaw of Vincent, vice-presidents; Frank Miller, of Helena, secretary. These officers with three additional members to be appointed will constitute the advisory board of the organization. L. H. Ellis, W. W. Wallace and L. L. Saxon were appointed as a committee to prepare a constitution and by-laws to be submitted at the next meeting.

Of those present, eighteen were enrolled as members of the new organization and plans were discussed for a county wide membership campaign.

Following the work of organization Commissioner I. T. Quinn of Montgomery, head of the state game and fish department, made an interesting address explaining the work of his department and showing the value in many ways to the people of the whole state of protecting the wild life. He stated that every citizen has an interest in the wild life and that it is only through the co-operation of the people in observing and enforcing the game laws that these rights can be protected.

Mr. Quinn stated that Shelby is the twenty-fourth county of the sixty-seven in the state to form a game and fish protective association and he said that the sentiment in favor of the game laws is growing stronger every day.

State Game Warden Ted Cottrell of Birmingham, who was also at the meeting made a brief talk emphasizing the importance of arousing the interest of all the people in the work of the association so as to have their help in the enforcement of the game laws.

It was announced that another meeting of the association will be held in a short time.

8,500 ALABAMIANS TO SHARE $200,000 IN STOCK DIVIDENDS

Alabama Power Co. Issues 18th Quarterly Dividend Checks on Oct. 1—Increase of $15,000 Over July Dividend.

Approximately 8,500 Alabamians in all sections of the State will share in a dividend of over 200,000 on October 1 when the checks covering the eighteenth quarterly dividend on Alabama Power Company preferred stock will be distributed, according to Thomas W. Martin, president of Alabama Power Company.

Mr. Martin stated that this dividend will exceed the one of July 1 by $15,000, owing to a large increase of stockholders during the past three months. He pointed out that Alabama Power Company preferred is now possibly the most widely owned security in the State and expressed gratification at the confidence of Alabamians in his Company as manifested by their constantly increasing investments in its securities.

Customer ownership has become one of the most important features of electric light and power management during the past few years. It originated comparatively recently in California where it proved so successful that it spread throughout the country. The Alabama Power Company entered the customer ownership field in June, 1920, when it created an investment department under the management of Thomas Bragg, which has had full charge of the sale of preferred stock. The immediate and continued success of this department is considered one of the marvels of the public utility world and the Alabama Power Company is said to lead all utilities in the country in amount of stock sold in proportion to the population served.

Apportionment of School Funds Given Out.

Shelby county's share of the state fund for the year 1924-25, is $35,159.04. This means that for each child in the county within school age, an appropriation of $4.36 is made. Last year the per capita distribution was $4.33. The total amount of the state school fund is $3,500,805.32.

There are 6,229 white children in Shelby county in school age and 1,835 negroes, a total of 8,064, according to figures given out recently by the state department of education. The total for the state is 803,179 of whom 494,715 are whites and 308,464 are negroes, a total increase of 7,374 over last year.

F. G. KOENIG JOINS LAW FIRM IN BIRMINGHAM

F. G. Koenig, a member of the law firm of Longshore, Koenig & Longshore, has accepted a partnership with John W. Altman, one of the leading attorneys of Birmingham, and will in a short time move with his family to that city.

Mr. Koenig came to Columbiana twelve years ago as a member of the law firm of Brown, Leeper & Koenig and he soon won for himself high standing at the Shelby County Bar. He has always been deeply interested in community affairs. Any movement that promised the betterment of Columbiana and Shelby county had his ardent support.

When the Exchange Club of Columbiana was organized some months ago Mr. Koenig was one of the first to accept membership and he became at once an ardent Exchangite. He saw in the club an organization that would bring together the citizens of Columbiana to work for the building of a better community..

Mr. Koenig served as a member of the town council and was recently elected almost unanimously for another term. For some years he served as chairman of the county chapter of the Red Cross and worked tirelessly to carry on the work of that organization.

Many friends of Mr. and Mrs. Koenig in Columbiana and throughout Shelby county will regret their decision to leave Columbiana and will wish for them continued success in their new home.

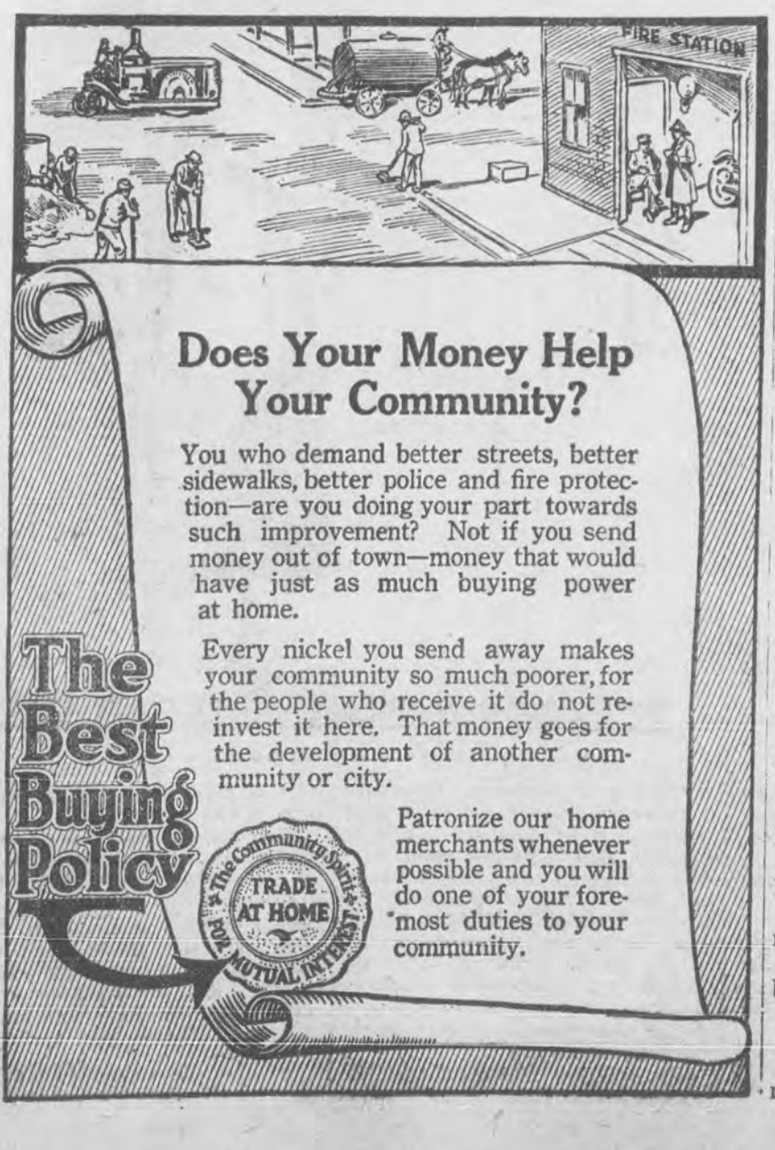
ublic School Report

The first monthly report of the public school of Columbiana, submitted by Principal J. B. King, shows an enrollment of 149; 75 girls and 74 boys. The average attendance for the month was 137, and the total number of tardiness was only 22.

The enrollment by grades is as follows: first grade 28 second grade, 13; third grade, 27; fourth grade, 20; fifth grade, 26; sixth grade, 14; and seventh grade, 21.

A unique and interesting plan is being used this year to encourage attendance at the meetings of the parent-teacher association. It is that of permitting the room that has the greatest attendance of mothers at the meeting to keep the flag for one month. At the end of the first month the flag was awarded to Miss Bishop's room. Mr. King says the plan is working fine and that the indication now is that considerable pressure will be brought to bear by the boys and girls at home, to encourage attendance at the parent-teacher meetings.



Bids For Calera-Wilton Road Are Rejected

The biggest contract was for 22 miles of road in Calhoun county from the Talladega line to Piedmont which will require an expenditure of over $500,000.

KINGDOM COMMUNITY HAS ACTIVE CHURCH AND SUNDAY SCHOOL

Rev. B. B. Gay, Rt.3, Columbiana, stated while in town Monday of last week, that he had a very delightful service on the Sunday before at the Kingdom Baptist church; of which he is pastor.

Mr. Gay is serving his fifth year as pastor of this church and he says that excellent work is being done. Services are held once a month and at almost every service one or more new members are received into the church. Sunday school, Mr. Gay says, is one of the best rural Sunday schools he knows of. Mr. King, the superintendent, uses his knowledge of and experience in public school work in the organization of his Sunday school so has a well organized school that is doing good work. The board of deacons is made up of some of the strongest and best men in the whole community and they are energetic leaders in the work of the church. Practically every family in the whole community attends church and Sunday school services.

Speaking of the community at large, Mr. Gay says that he doesn't know of a community anywhere in which a finer spirit prevails. The people live together in complete harmony as good neighbors and there are no violations of the law. Sheriff Falkner with all his activity does not find any work in this community.

Preaching services are held at Kingdom on the first Sunday in every month. Sunday school every Sunday morning.

JEFFERSON LEADS IN SCHOOL COUNT

FIGURES IN 1924 SCHOOL CENSUS SHOWS GAIN IN 32 COUNTIES AND LOSS IN 35

Montgomery, Ala.—Figures announced on the 1924 school census showed that Jefferson County made a greater gain in enumeration over the last census in 1922 than did the rest of the State of Alabama. Of the 67 counties, 35 showed a loss and 32 a gain on the 1924 census as compared with that of 1922.

For the State, not counting Jefferson County, the 1924 census showed a total enumeration of children, ages 7 to 20 inclusive of 803,179, compared with 795,805 in 1922, a gain of 7,374. For Jefferson County, the figure was 98,639 in 1924 and 89,504 in 1922, a gain of 9,135.

Montgomery County showed a gain, while Mobile County experienced a loss. The figure for Montgomery was 27,093 in 1924 and 26,117 in 1922, while for Mobile the figures were 25,089 in 1924 and 25,778 in 1922.

The figures for the State excluding Jefferson showed enumeration of white children of 494,715 in 1924 and 485,440 in 1922, a gain of of 9,275. For negro children the figures were 308,464 in 1924 and 310,362 in 1922, a loss of 1901.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

Decatur people are happy in the belief that their new streets are to cost them only $250,000 instead of $300,000 as was at first expected, following an announcement by Superintendent Brownlee of the Independent Paving Company, of Birmingham, which has the contract for building all the new streets. Mr. Brownlee says that he did not expect to turn in a bill for over a quarter of a million when his street building contract is completed at the end of this year. The original bond issue for the streets was $300,000 Mr. Brownlee explained that efficient working men, reduced estimates of cast and also the fact that much of the machinery of his company was already here when he began work.

Ed Gewin, tax assessor of Hale County, is the banner farmer so far heard from. On a two-mule farm near Cedarville, he has made a wonderful crop of cotton, on which he expects to clear $3,000. He has rushed his work to take advantage of the clear weather, has picked and ginned his crop, plowed his land, and has a good stand of vetch already up on it.

T. C. Germain, owner and manager of a moving picture theatre in Talladega has been arraigned before U. S. Commissioner Pickard at Gadsden on the charge of not paying the theatre tax as required by the act of Congress on February 24, 1919. He pleaded guilty and his bond was fixed at $500.

In the fat stock show held at Montgomery, Miss Hattie Kopecky won the second prize with a Dallas County raised calf, and Joe Givhan, a Dallas County club boy, held sixth place with the "Rotary Calf," so called because the local Rotary Club took a substantial interest in this special exhibit.

Wife No. 1 with two children, and Wife No. 2 with one child appearing in court at Greenville against the Rev. Joseph Matthews, charged with bigamy was sufficient evidence for the trial jury to render a verdict of guilty without deliberation.

An illicit still hidden in the grass on Hall's Mill Creek in Mobile County has finally yielded to the efforts of the State and Federal law enforcement men. This still was searched for several times although the officers came within ten feet of it. The reason for the officers being baffled was that the still and all fixtures were painted green to resemble nearby grass and brush. The long worm of the still leading to the water was camouflaged also. The officers destroyed the still and 500 gallons of mash.

The attendance banner of the Russell County Baptist Association was awarded to the Westside Baptist Church of Phenix City by the association in convention at Oswichee. Ala. Mrs. L. G. Silas of Fort Mitchell was elected president and Miss Ruth Weekly of Phenix City was elected chairman for the young people's department when officers for the ensuing year were elected.

I. M. Gilbert lost his $10,000 damage suit against Etowah County because Judge Steele sustained demurrers of the defense in which it was claimed the county cannot be sued by an employe since it is a part of the State government. The court held that the county can be sued only in a few cases specified by law.

The total assessment of Pike County this year will amount to $9,850,510, not including the automobile values, which will not be definitely known until February, 1925. This is according to information given by V. A. Gibson, tax assessor, who has sent in the county report of tax assessments to the State Tax Commission.

When the Norwegian steamer Vera docked at Mobile from Peurta Castilla, Honduras, Joseph Barnes, member of the engine crew was removed to the marine hospital with serious injuries. Barnes fell into the hold of the vessel while the Vera was en route to this port and was seriously hurt.

"A Sunny Road," a new book written by Dr. S. A. Steele, pastor of the First Methodist Church of Decatur has been put on the market. Dr. Steele's book explains home life in Dixie during the war. The writer speaks as a Southerner of the Southerners.

Facilitating the large cotton movement which is being concentrated this fall for export and domestic shipment the United States Shipping Board has announced the allocation of an additional vessel at Mobile to lift a cargo of staple for Bremen and Rotterdam, sailing October 28.

Officers of the State Law Enforcement Department made a total of 249 arrests during the month of September, as shown by the monthly report of Chief Walter K. McAdory. Stills to the number of 136 were destroyed during the month.

Work on the Gimbell Hill, near the Walker county line, has been finished. Several hundred dollars was appropriated by citizens of Corona and Berry to be used in working the hill, which was practically rebuilt for over a half-mile.

Sixty university students have been chosen to membership in the Blackfriars, the university dramatic organization, after the annual tryout that lasted nearly four hours. Over 160 students were candidates for membership.

A negro killed at Montgomery by N. H. Collins after he had thrown a brick at Collins and while he is alleged to have been advancing on Collins with an iron bar in his hand has been identified as Clyde Alex Bostick, an ex-convict.

Harry Spratt, George Jackson, alias George Moore, and Leroy Smith are being held at Talladega for McFall under charges of grand larceny. They are alleged to have stolen 306 pounds of seed cotton that had been gathered and left in the field overnight.

Announcement has been made that the boy and girl scouts of Gadsden would hold their annual field day exercises at Dwight Park, October 18. The boy scouts will enter a six weeks efficiency contest October 12.

Information has reached the State Department of Game and Fisheries of the conviction of Spencer Tinker, Washington County, on a charge of hunting without license. Tinker was fined $10 and costs.

Aubrey Smith, aged 26 years, prosperous farmer living on the highway between Albertville and Guntersville, died from what was supposed to be a poisonous drug, taken with suicidal intent.

The handsome home of R. M. Herring in the Marylee community near Jasper, was totally destroyed by fire, together with the contents. The fire occurred while the family was away from home.

Cotton is being moved rapidly at Uniontown. Two thousand bales are being shipped to one concern in New York City through the Canehake Warehouse and Trading Company.

Slim Carter, of Hazelgreen, has been unanimously re-elected 'Bama's cheerleader. Hamilton Perkins, Bessemer; Waldo Macon, Wetumpka, and Troy Allen, Oxford, were named his assistants.

J. I. Guyton, a prominent merchant of Vernon, who was severely injured when an automobile struck him a few days ago, is now able to be at his place of business.

The public terms of the Heflin City School was opened Monday, October 13.

Tunic Blouse Holds Interest; Graceful Afternoon Gowns

TO THE story of fall blouses, a long chapter, full of interest, has been added. It occupies itself with the history of the tunic-blouse which tunic are so greatly varied that it is hardly possible to find two alike. Crepe de chine and crepe satin, trimmed with filet and val lace, like the pretty blouse pictured, make up an interesting part of displays in all the smart fall colors. Then there are overblouses and tunics of printed silks and others of black crepe satin, with trimming of printed velvet. Beaded designs, embroidery and fringe, find themselves challenged by novel, hand-wrought applique trimmings in which suede cloth, narrow metallic braid and net are used. In addition hand painting invites attention on tunics of black crepe satin used in border effect about the hems.

While trimmings are called upon to give interest and distinction to blouses and tunics in plain colors there is another line of them that uses very little for varying the toilette than their more ornate rivals because they are inconspicuous and allow the use of chic accessories. If one can indulge in an assortment of dresses for afternoon this consideration need not enter into the choice of styles, but the majority of women must limit themselves. They are sensible when they choose (as they usually do) graceful and simple gowns (of first-rate materials) that are elegant but not assertive in design

A beautiful example of a dress of this character is pictured here made of black crepe de chine and adorned with beaded bands, also in black. It tells its own simple but exquisite story and is the sort of dress that its wearer will never tire of. The mode presents many versions of present styles in dresses of this character and naturally many of them are in black. With these gowns sashes, corsage ornaments, scarfs, collars, jewelry contribute means of adding color and variety.

In materials crepe-satin is a favorite because both its surfaces may be combined in inconspicuous decorative effects. Then there are plain, straight-line black velvet gowns, satin and lace combinations and new arrivals in which faille or bengaline silk are combined with kasha or other cloth. Broadcloth is also represented in the displays of afternoon gowns.

Beautiful Afternoon Gown.

in the way of decoration. These are the beautiful models made of brocaded chiffon. The brocades are so colorful and rich that designers finish them with a few very handsome buttons in cut steel or glass—or narrow fur banding or narrow borders in a plain color. Among new imports long sleeves are compelling attention—and necklines are much varied. In blouses as in millinery the mode presents an ever-changing kaleidoscope in which endless changes appear.

The simplest afternoon and dinner gowns afford greater opportunities

While we are looking about for dependable and adaptable afternoon garb we run across many tempting interpretations of current styles in combinations of black with a color. Black satin, with side panels and vest of dull-purple georgette, black with an apronlike tunic of tobacco-brown satin, black with vivid green introduced in a sash and black with flesh color.

The day dies into night—night into dawn—

Just as of old.

A FEW CREOLE DISHES

Many of the tasty southern dishes though not expensive in themselves take much time in preparation; however, when prepared, they are well worth the trouble.

La Daube.—La daube is simply a Southern pot roast, yet not as simple as our pot roasts in the North. To make this dish one may use beef or veal, or if for a very choice occasion, turkey, goose or chicken. For a small dinner five pounds of round steak will be sufficient; rump may be used equally well, with one-fourth pound of salt pork sliced very thin, two large onions, three carrots, a turnip, a clove of garlic, parsley cut fine, a bay leaf and a pinch of thyme. Chop one onion, the bay leaf and the parsley very fine. Rub the pork slices with finely minced herbs and spices, then flour the meat all over. Cut the other onion into slices and brown in fat in the bottom of an iron kettle; lay the meat tied in shape over the onion and cover closely. Cook, turning the meat often until it is well-browned on all sides. Lay the vegetables, peeled and sliced about the meat, brown them well, then cover with boiling water, cover closely and simmer for three hours longer. Serve hot or cold.

Poulet Creole.—Cut up a fine, tender chicken as for frying, season well by rubbing with salt and pepper, then melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a frying pan and brown the chicken slowly in it. Now add one large onion finely chopped and cook until it, too, is well browned, then add one-tablespoonful of flour, and toss until all are well browned. Add two large peeled tomatoes cut into small pieces, a sprig of parsley chopped, a pinch of thyme, half a bay leaf and a clove of garlic minced to a pulp; cover and simmer for an hour. At the end of the time add a cupful of boiling water and three green peppers cut into strips. Cover and simmer again for three-quarters of an hour or until the chicken is very tender. Add seasoning of salt and pepper as needed. Serve with hot, nicely boiled rice.

Pompano With Lemon Butter.—Split the fish, if large, down the back, clean and season well by rubbing in plenty of salt and pepper. Brush the hot broiler with olive oil, lay on the fish and broil on both sides until a rich brown. Place on a hot dish, spread with soft butter and squeeze lemon juice over it. Garnish with parsley and sliced lemon. Pomano is a favorite fish in the warm climates.

NATIONAL HONORS AND LOCAL SALES

Would you ever think of being hugely interested in corsets, other people's corsets at that? And if you had discovered that all the fascinating art and science of salesmanship could be wrapped up in coutil and whalebone, would you think you had any chance of carrying off a record, way out in Idaho? Well, Sophie Boellert was and did. That is to say, she found herself a saleswoman in a Boise store. She set herself to "work, and hard work, with tireless ambition to go on and on." She took one course of study after another, for "we never have enough learning."

That she won the national prize in corset selling not long ago is just one milestone on her way. She's buyer and department manager in the Boise Mode. That means that she has come to know intimately the buying public of Idaho, and the manufacturers of America and the world as they are translated to the retail trade through the clever, complicated, ever changing, ever interesting New York market. She's a director of the store, which means that she's managed to learn how to work with other people day in and day out, to get her own way when it's based on good hard knowledge without irritating the other person and to yield her opinion as gracefully when other judgment is the better.

Her position means work with much overtime, but Miss Boellert finds opportunity for outside interests. "I've always been interested in helping girls up in their work," she says. "My own experience is that the best foundations for the average girl are laid in smaller towns. People seem to have more time. But in any place the study of human nature is the most interesting one. This many-sided study is a great help in any work. One of the most interesting studies today is selling. We are all doing that. It has many angles and the whole world enters it at some angle."

Miss Boellert's own life seems to bear out her statement about the wide angle vision possible to the good saleswoman wherever she is. The world brought more than one honor to the Idaho woman who had been so conscientiously preparing herself. And when, just after the war, the National Federation of Business and Professional Women was started, the women of Idaho chose Miss Boellert to be their representative in the national council. Each year they have re-elected her. This year she has mothered two new clubs into being, and has two more on the point of organization. "So," she comments, "I'm busy most of the time."

"KINDLY WATCH JANE"

If a woman really wants to have fun in this modern world, said woman get into a niche where she can watch, report upon and, on occasion, manipulate some of the currents of feminism. There's a woman out in Topeka doing that very thing. Wherefore there has grown up a tradition in Kansas, particularly in Kansas politics, "Kindly watch Jane!" Now Jane is merely a nickname for a newspaper known officially as the Kansas Woman's Journal. It is the initials of the paper plus the necessities of the case that worded the slogan quoted.

Who and what are behind Jane? There's an advisory board that covers all one side of a sheet of paper. There's a motto, "Devoted to the interests of women, children and home," that is honestly lived up to. There was during the last political campaign, the Republican state central committee, which made the paper official organ of the Republican women of Kansas. The women are the subscribers, both men and women. And there is Lilla Day Monroe, editor, who describes herself as "chiefly responsible except when the printers of my most capable publishing company commit some kind of crime or mayhem possibly, on some pet article."

It was July when Mrs. Monroe wrote: "Ha' mercy! I have the rheumatism. I've one wrist trussed up in a red flannel bandage. (Dr. said hot application and I'll leave it to you if there's anything more torrid than a red flannel bandage.)

"I was born into a family that was crazy to have a girl. As the only girl in a bunch of boys, I had many privileges, but I had to learn to be a good sport. My father died. I became a school teacher, read law, grew up and married a lawyer politician. When I first went away to school I boarded in the same place with a newspaper man and his wife, who were mighty nice to the lonesome little stranger. The editor took the most inconvenient time to become drunk. With his wife I used to get up in the middle of the night to get out the Courier. To keep away learned to set type.

"I only advise a girl to go to a big city for a bit of post graduate work. For a sojourn that will make her appreciate the wide spaces more when she comes back. One of the greatest boons for women is the feeling that they have a sort of proprietary interest in the home town, such as I have for Topeka

Zen of The Y.D.

A NOVEL OF THE FOOTHILLS

—12—

"A suit for a fellow about my size," explained. "He's visitin' out at the ranch, an' he hefts about the same as me. Put in one of them Hereford shirts an' a collar."

Y.D. racked the package surreptitiously in his room and awaited the story of Zen's marriage with mingled emotions.

Zen, yielding to Transley's importunities, had at last said that it should be Christmas day. The wedding would be in the house, with the leading ranchers and farmers of the district as invited guests, and the general understanding was to be given out that the countryside as a whole would be welcome. All could not be taken care of in the house, so Y.D. gave orders that the hay was to be cleared out of one of the barns and the floor put in place for dancing. Open house would be held in the barn and in the bunkhouse, where substantial refreshments would be served to all and sundry.

Christmas day dawned with a seasonable nip to the air, but the sun was warm and bright. As the hour approached Zen found herself possessed of a calmness which she deemed worthy of Y.D.'s daughter. She had elected to be unattended as she had no very special girl friend, and that seemed the simplest way out of the problem of selecting someone for this honor. She was, however, duly assisted with her dressing, and the color of her fine cheeks burned under with the compliments to which she listened with modest appreciation. By a quarter to the hour it was discovered that Y.D. had not yet dressed for the occasion. He was, in fact, engaged with Landson in making a definitive arrangement for the disposition of next year's hay. Zen had been so insistent upon an invitation being sent to Mr. and Mrs. Landson, and Y. D., although fearing a snub for his pains, at last conceded the point. He had done his neighbor nothing less than justice, and now he found Landson, with the assistance of a well-filled stone jug, were burying the hatchet in a corner of the bunkhouse.

"Hang this dressin'," Y.D. remonstrated when a message demanding instant action reached him. "Landson'll bear me now! I wouldn't take a hundred dollars for that girl, y' understand—and I wouldn't trade a single cayuse for another!"

Still grumbling, he found his way to his room and began a wrestle with the "store" clothes. Before the fight was over he was being reminded through the door that he wasn't ropin' a steer, and everybody was waiting. At the last moment he discovered that he had neglected to buy boots. There was nothing for it but his big ranch boots, so on they went. Then he sought Zen in her room. "Will I do this?" he asked, feeling very foolish.

Zen could have laughed, or she might have cried, but she did neither. She sensed in some way the fact that for her father this experience was a terrible ordeal. So she just slipped her arm through his and whispered: "Of course you'll do, you silly old dear," and tripped down the stairs on the side of his ponderous steps.

After the ceremony the elder people went down to dinner in the house, and the others in the bunk-house. Zen was radiant and calm; Transley handsome, delighted, self-possessed. His good luck was the subject of many a comment, both inside and out of the house. He accepted it at its full value and yet as one who has a right to expect that luck will play him some more.

Suddenly there was a rush from the door, and Zen found herself being carried bodily away. The young people had decided that the dancing should wait no longer, so a half dozen cowboys had been deputed to kidnap the bride and carry her to the barn, where the fiddles were already strumming. Zen insisted that the first dance should belong to Transley, but after she had danced with the young ranchmen cowboys with strict impartiality and even as she danced she found herself wondering if, among all this representation of the countryside, that one upon whom her thoughts had dwelt so much should be missing. She found herself watching the door. It would have been only a despicable neglect to her—surely he might have helped to whirl her joyously into the new life in which the past was to be forgotten. . . . How much better that they should part now, than with the memories they would have!

But Dennison Grant did not appear. Evidently he preferred to keep his distance. . . .

Then at last the night had worn on and it was time for the bridal party to leave if they were to catch the evening train in town, and they had ridden down the foothill trails to the thunder of many accompanying hoof-beats, the old ranch became suddenly a place very quiet and still and alone. Y.D. sat down in the corner of the big room by the fire, and saw strange pictures in its dying embers. Zen. . . . Zen! . . . Transley was a good fellow, but how much a man will take with scarce a thank-you! . . . Presently Y.D. became aware of a hand resting upon his shoulder, and tingling from its fingertips came something akin to the almost forgotten rapture of a day long gone. He raised his great palm and took that slowly ageing hand, once round and fresh like Zen's, in his. Together they watched the fire die out in the silence of their empty house. . . .

CHAPTER X

Grant occupied himself with the work of the ranch that winter, spring and summer. Occasional news of Mrs. Transley filtered through; she was too prominent a character in that countryside to be lost track of in a season. But anything which reached Grant came through accidental channels; he sought no information of her, and turned a deaf ear, almost, to what he heard. Then in the fall came an incident which immediately changed the course of his career.

It came in the form of an important-looking letter with an Eastern postmark. It had been delivered with other mail at the house, and Landson himself brought it down. Grant read it and at first stared at it somewhat blankly, as one not taking in its full portent.

"Not bad news, I hope?" said his employer, cloaking his curiosity in commiseration.

"Rather," Grant admitted, and handed him the letter. Landson read:

"It is our duty to place before you information which must be of a very distressing nature, and which at the same time will have the effect of greatly increasing your responsibilities and opportunities. Unless you have happened to see the brief dispatches which have appeared in the press this letter will doubtless be the first intimation to you that your father and younger brother Roy were the victims of a most regrettable accident while motoring on a brief holiday in the South. The automobile in which they were traveling was struck by a fast train, and both of them received injuries from which they succumbed almost immediately.

"Your father, by his will, left all his property, aside from certain behests to charity, to his son Roy, but Roy had no will, and as he was unmarried, and as there are no other surviving members of the family except yourself, the entire estate, less the bequests already referred to, descends to you. We have not yet attempted an appraisal, but you will know that the amount is very considerable indeed. In recent years your father's business undertakings were remarkably successful, and we think we may conservatively suggest that the amount of the estate will be very much greater than even you may anticipate.

"The brokerage firm which your father founded is, temporarily, without a head. You have had some experience in your father's office, and as his solicitors for many years, we take the liberty of suggesting that you should immediately assume control of the business. A faithful staff are at present continuing it to the best of their ability, but you will understand that a permanent organization must be effected at as early a date as may be possible.

"Inability to locate you until after somewhat exhaustive inquiries has been made explains the failure to notify you by wire in time to permit of your attending the funeral of your father and brother, which took place in this city on the eighth instant, and was marked by many evidences of respect.

"We beg to tender our very sincere sympathy, and to urge upon you that you so arrange your affairs as to enable you to assume the responsibilities which have, in a sense, been forced upon you, at a very early date. In the meantime we assure you of our earnest attention to your interests.

"Yours sincerely,

"BARRETT, JONES, BARRETT, DEACON & BARRETT."

"Well, I guess it means you've struck oil, and I've lost a good foreman," said Landson, as he returned the letter. "I'm sorry about your loss, Grant, and glad to hear of your good luck, if I may put it that way. What do you reckon she's worth?" he asked, after waiting as long as his patience would permit.

"Oh, I don't know. Possibly six or eight millions by this time."

"Six or eight millions! Jehoshaphat! What will you do with it?"

"Look after it. Mr. Landson, you know that I have never worried about money; if I had I wouldn't be here. I don't care for the money, but any son-of-a-gun who takes it from me is a better man than I am, and I'll sit up nights at both ends of the day to beat him at his own game. Now, just as soon as you can line up some one to take charge I'll have to beat it."

Grant put his affairs in order as quickly as possible, and started for the East with a trunkful of clothes. But even before he started one thought had risen up to haunt him. He crushed it down, but it would insist. If only this had happened a year ago. . . .

Grant reached his old home city late at night, and after a quiet cigar and a stroll through some of the half-forgotten streets he put up at one of the best hotels. He was deferentially shown to a room about as large as the whole Landson house; soft lights were burning under pink shades; his feet fell noiselessly on the thick carpets. He placed a chair by a window, where he could watch the myriad lights of the city, and tried to appraise the new sphere in which he found himself. It would be a very different game from riding the ranges or roping steers, but it would be a game, nevertheless; a game in which he would have to stand on his own resources even more than in those brave days in the foothills. He relished the notion of the game even while he was indifferent to the prize. He had no clear idea what he eventually should do with his wealth; that was something to think about very carefully in the days and years to come. In the meantime his job was to handle a big business in the way it should be handled.

He turned the water into his bath; there was a smell about the towels, the linen, the soap, that was very grateful to his nostrils. . . .

In the morning he passed by the office of Grant & Son. He did not turn in, but pursued his way to a door where a great brass plate announced the law firm of Barrett, Jones, Barrett, Deacon & Barrett. He smiled at this elaboration of names; it represented three generations of the Barrett family and two sons-in-law. Grant found himself speculating over a name for the Landson ranch; it might have been Landson, Grant, Landson, Murphy, Skinner & Pete. . . .

As a result of his interview it was arranged that Mr. Jones, second luminary of the firm of legal lights, should take Grant's affairs under his particular care until the young Westerner felt safe in his new saddle. When Grant, accompanied by Jones, finally appeared at the office of his father's firm he was received with a deference amounting almost to obeisance. Murdoch, the chief clerk, and manager of the business in all but title, who had known him in the old days when he had been "Mr. Denny," bore him into the private office which had for so many years been the sacred recess of the senior Grant. Only big men or trusted employees were in the habit of passing those silent green doors.

"Well, Murdy, old boy, how goes it?" Grant had said when they met, taking his hand in a husky grip.

"Not so bad, sir; not so bad, considering the shock of the accident, sir. And we are all so glad to see you—we who knew you before, sir."

"Listen, Murdy," said Grant. "What's the idea of all the sirs?"

"Why," said the somewhat abashed official, "you know you are now the head of the firm, sir."

"Quite so. Because a chauffeur neglected to look over his shoulder I am converted from a cow puncher to a sir. Well, go easy on it. If a man has native dignity in him he doesn't need it piled on from outside."

"Very true sir. I hope you will be comfortable here. Some memorable matters have been transacted within these walls, sir. Let me take your hat and cane."

"Cane? What cane?"

"Your stick, sir; didn't you have a stick?"

"What for? Have you rattlers here? Oh, I see—more dignity. No, I don't carry a stick. Perhaps when I'm old—"

"You'll have to try and accommodate yourself to our manners," said Jones, when Murdoch had left the room. "They may seem unnecessary, or even absurd, but they are sanctioned by custom, and, you know, civilization is built on custom. The poet speaks of a freedom which 'slowly broadens down from precedent to precedent.' Precedent is custom. Never defy custom, or you will find her your master. Humor her and she will be your slave. Now I think I shall leave, while you try and attune yourself to the atmosphere of these surroundings."

So this was the room which had been the inner shrine of the firm of Grant & Son. The quarters were new since he had left the East; the furnishings revealed that large simplicity which is elegance and wealth. A painting of the elder Grant hung from the wall; Dennison stood before it, looking into the sad, capable, gray eyes. What had life brought to his father that was worth the price those eyes reflected? Dennison found his own eyes moistening with memories now strangely poignant. . . .

"Environment," the young man murmured, as he turned from the portrait, "environment, master of everything! And yet—"

A photograph of Roy stood on the mantelpiece, and beside it, in a little silver frame, was one of his mother. . . . Grant pulled himself together and fell to an examination of the papers in his father's desk.

Grant's first concern was to get a grasp of the business affairs which had so unexpectedly come under his direction. To accomplish this he continued the practice of the Landson ranch; he was up every morning at five, and had done a day's work before the members of his staff began to assemble. For advice he turned to Jones and Murdoch, and the management of routine affairs he left entirely in the hands of the latter. He had soon convinced himself that the camaraderie of the ranch would not work in a staff of this kind, so while he was formulating plans of his own he left the administration to Murdoch. He found this absence of companionship the most unpleasant feature of his position; it seemed that his wealth had elevated him out of the human family. He wavered between amusement and annoyance over the deference that was paid him. Some of the staff were openly terrified at his approach.

Not so Miss Bruce. Miss Bruce had tapped on the door and entered with the words, "I was your father's stenographer. He left practically all his personal correspondence to me. I worked at this desk in the corner, and had a private office through the door there into which I slipped when my absence was preferred."

She had crossed the room, and, instead of standing respectfully before Grant's desk, had come around the end of it. Grant looked up with some surprise, and noted that her features were not without comprehending qualities.

"How do you think you're going to like your job?" she asked.

Grant swung around quickly in his chair. No one in the staff had spoken to him like that; Murdoch himself would not have dared address him in so familiar a manner. He decided to take a firm position.

"Were you in the habit of speaking to my father like that?"

"Your father was a man well on in years, Mr. Grant. Every man according to his age."

Grant looked at her keenly. Whatever her words, he had to admit that her tone was not impertinent.

"You appear to be a very advanced young woman," he remarked. "I am a little surprised—I had hardly thought my father would select young women of your type as his confidential secretaries."

"Private stenographer," she corrected. "A little extra side on a title is neither here nor there. Well, I will admit that I rather took your father's breath at times; he discharged me so often it became a habit, but we grew to have a sort of tacit understanding that that was just his way of blowing off steam. You see, I did his work, and I did it right. I never lost my head when he got into a temper; I could always read my notes even after he had spent most of the day in death grips with some business rival. You see, I wasn't afraid of him, not the least bit. And I'm not afraid of you."

"I don't believe you are," Grant admitted. "You are a remarkable woman. I think we shall get along all right if you are able to distinguish between independence and bravado." He turned to his desk, then suddenly looked up again. He was homesick for some one he could talk to frankly.

"I don't mind telling you," he said abruptly, "that the deference which is being showered upon me around this institution gives me a good deal of a pain. I've been accustomed to working with men on the same level. They took their orders from me, and they carried them out, but the older hands called me by my first name, and any of them swore back when he thought he had occasion. I can't fit in to this 'Yes sir,' 'no sir,' 'Very good, sir,' way of doing business. It doesn't ring true."

Quick Witted, but—

Afraid to breathe, almost, the returned reveller crept quietly into his bedchamber as the gray dawn was breaking. Sitting on the edge of the bed, he cautiously undid his boots. But, with all his care, his wife stirred in bed, and he presently was all too well aware of a pair of sleepy eyes regarding him over the edge of the sheet.

"Why, Tom," yawned the little woman, "how early you are this morning!"

"Yes, my dear," replied Tom, stifling a groan, "I've got to go to Montreal for the firm today."

And replacing his footgear the wretched man dragged his aching limbs out again into the cold and heartless streets.

HOW TO KEEP WELL

Dr. Frederick R. Green, Editor of "Health."

THE DANGER OF BEING BEAUTIFUL

MOST of us think of doctors as highly scientific, dignified men who are only interested in dreadful and mysterious diseases which they designate by long Latin names. Yet doctors today are giving more time and attention to the every-day details of life than ever before.

At the meeting of the American Medical association held at Chicago Dr. H. M. Cole of Cleveland, Ohio, read a paper, which was widely discussed, on dermatoses due to cosmetics. Translated into every-day English, this means inflammation of the skin caused by powder and rouge. Almost every girl and woman uses some kind of powder.

In our grandmothers' day a woman who rouged her cheeks or painted her lips was regarded as "fast" if not actually disreputable.

The face powder most generally used a generation ago was French rice powder, a fine starch made from the rice grain. While this is practically harmless in itself, it has two dangers. Being a vegetable substance, it ferments and decomposes when damp. If the pores of the skin become clogged with it, the powder may become rancid and cause small abscesses or even boils. The second danger is that, if the rice powder gets in the eyes it may cause irritation.

Hair dyes are more dangerous. Some of them contain lead acetate, a powerful chemical which not only injures the hair but may also cause severe irritation and poisoning of the skin.

This substance is also present in some facial creams and enamels. Its continued use may cause lead poisoning.

Mercury or quicksilver is used in some of the cheaper face bleaches, facial creams, freckle lotions and powders. This powerful drug may cause severe poisoning or may result in a bluish discoloration of the skin. Arsenic is also found in some hair tonics, as well as salicylic acid, carbolic acid and other equally powerful and dangerous chemicals. Many hair tonics contain wood alcohol, a dangerous and irritating poison.

The most dangerous drug of all, however, has no common name. It is known to chemists as paraphenylendiamin. It is so dangerous that its use is forbidden by law in France, Germany and Austria. It is widely used in this country in hair dyes and fur dyes and in the mascara used to stain the eyebrows and to bead the eyelashes. This drug is not only highly irritating to the skin, but may affect the eyes or even cause death.

There is little if any objection to powders or rouges provided they are pure. Hair dyes and facial bleaches may contain strong and injurious chemicals.

GETTING READY TO RESIST THE ENEMY

THE summer is the most healthful season of the year. While the warm days may be oppressive and sometimes exhausting, the death rate is lower in July, August and September than in any other part of the year. But in the late fall and winter sickness increases. "colds," bronchitis, influenza and pneumonia become common. By February and March they have reached their height. There are more deaths from pneumonia during the early spring than any other time of the year.

There are many reasons for this. Our vitality and resistance to infection have been lowered by the long winter. The early spring days, bright and promising, but raw and chilling, tempt us to exposure that we wouldn't think of in midwinter.

The disease germs gain in strength during the winter months when they have passed from one victim to another and so have become stronger than they were in the fall.

In the summer we live outdoors or under outdoor conditions. Our houses are not heated. Our windows are open day and night.

When cold weather comes, we shut our windows, put on storm doors and start our furnaces. We wear heavy clothes, we eat more heavy food, we take less exercise, we perspire less, we take fewer baths, we drink less water.

Our bodies become clogged up with waste products, our lungs get less fresh air, our blood has less oxygen and our resistance is lowered. When one member of the household or one person in an office develops a "cold" it runs through the whole group, each one of whom, perhaps, becomes a new center for spreading the disease.

During the fall and early winter, make special efforts to keep fit. Don't overheat your house, don't wear more clothes than you need. Work and sleep with your windows open. Drink plenty of water. Don't eat heavy food, but have plenty of fruits and vegetables. Take some exercise each day in the open air. Avoid crowds. Get eight hours sleep every night. Don't neglect "colds." Don't get wet or chilled. Don't get "run down." At the first sign of infection, especially if you are over forty, go to bed and stay there until you are well.

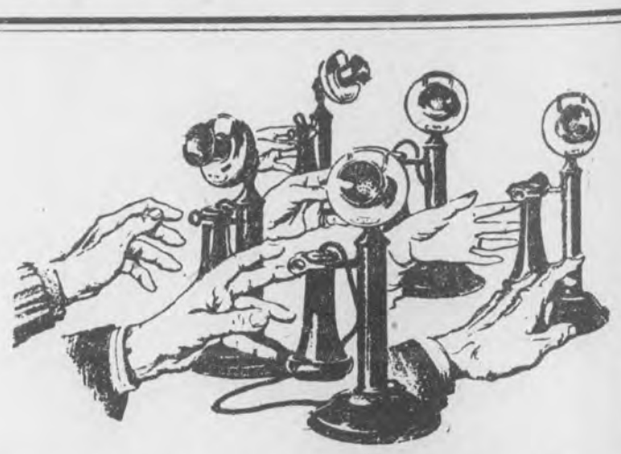
WHEN Congress adjourned last June this large number of proposed laws affecting the railroads was receiving the attention of members of the House and Senate. Fortunately for the American people, for you who are reading this newspaper, none of the bills was passed, but many of them are now on the calendar and will be considered without further preliminary action when Congress convenes on December 1st.

Congress generally wishes to do right, but certain interests are now proposing railroad legislation, which, if enacted, would not only impair the railroad service but would be seriously hurtful to the general business interests of the country.

The railroads should have further trial under the existing laws. They need a prolonged respite from legislative agitation, during which the railroad managers and other forces can devote themselves to plain transportation and the people can enjoy the high-class railway service and prosperity which they now have without risks from experimental tinkering.

Railroad managers feel that it is their duty to acquaint the public with the facts about the railroads, and in that way, through the building up of a sound public sentiment, hold up the hands of fair-minded Congressmen and Senators, who are willing that the railroads shall have their fighting chance at this time of crisis in their affairs; that they shall have an opportunity to work out their salvation under the provisions of the laws now on our statute books, and that their operations shall not be further hampered through obstructive legislation.



Hands At The Telephone

WHENEVER you reach for your telephone, thousands of other hands are making the very same motion.

More than 700,000 times each working day in Alabama someone's hand reaches for the telephone to send a message.

If you could see these calls start—if you could follow them to their destinations—if you could see the action they create and the results they produce—you would have a picture of Alabama's activities—social, commercial, industrial.

It would be a picture of a great State in swift and rhythmic action, with the telephone making possible the efficient production, transportation, distribution and sale of practically every article you use.

You would see the weaving of a vast fabric of communication affecting the comfort, the welfare, the happiness and the business or social success of multitudes of people.

Hands at the telephone! At 68,000 Bell telephones in the State every day! Think what they mean to Alabama. And to YOU!

HOW DOCTORS TREAT COLDS AND THE FLU

To break up a cold over night or to cut short an attack of grippe, influenza or sore throat, physicians and druggists are now recommending Calotabs, the nauseless Calomel tablet, that is purified from dangerous and sickening effects. Those who have tried it say that it acts like magic, by far more effective and certain than the old style calomel, heretofore recommended by physicians.

One or two Calotabs at bed time with a swallow of water,—that's all. No salts, no nausea nor the slightest interference with eating, work or pleasures. Next morning your cold has vanished and your system feels refreshed and purified. Calotabs are sold only in original sealed packages, price ten cents for the vest-pocket size; thirty-five cents for the large family package. Recommended and guaranteed by druggists. Your money back if you are not delighted.—adv.

Mr. Teague stated that a letter recently received from his home told of the fear of an early frost that would greatly damage the corn crop in that section. His own crop, he said, was already practically safe, he having planted an early maturing variety that for several years he had found to be very satisfactory.

If it is a Cole's Sanitary Down Draft then she is always sure of her baking and her cooking. She knows that it is the best range that money can buy. She relies on it absolutely. COTTON FARMERS ARE FOLLOWING OLD HABIT

(By L. N. Duncan, Director Alabama Extension Service.)

Cotton farmers are following the same old circle again this fall. They have produced a fair crop and are working over time picking it, rushing it to gins, and forcing it on the markets. Consequently there has been a very substantial decline in the price since the beginning of the picking season.

While this is being done by unorganized growers, the members of the Farm Bureau Cotton Association are pooling their cotton for orderly marketing. They are relieving an over-burdened market, but with only a minority of the growers in this association they are unable to control the situation.

The best thing for all Alabama cotton growers is to pool their cotton just as members of the association are doing so that experts may sell it on a supply and demand basis throughout the year. If this is done a much higher average price will certainly be obtained.

We must admit that disorganized marketing is a failure. After following it for a century our farms are mortgaged, many of our crops are mortgaged before the seed are planted, 58 percent of them are operated by tenants, our soils are worn and exhausted, and our cotton growers are unable to educate their children or to have good homes, nicely furnished, and other comforts and conveniences enjoyed by others. Farm women and girls still work in cotton fields.

A great need is to return to the producer of cotton a larger portion of the dollar paid by the consumer for cotton products. This will hearten the farmer, give him courage, a new outlook, and make him a better and more prosperous citizens.

This can be done by co-operative marketing.

Again I say that disorganized marketing is a failure, and ask that we give co-operative marketing a fair chance to reveal its advantages. Pool your cotton.

HELPED HER IN EVERY WAY

So Writes Mrs. Trombley of Sharon, Vt., Concerning Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Sharon, Vermont. — "I was weak and run-down, had a tired feeling and bearing-down pains. I saw an advertisement in the newspaper about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and began taking it. It has stopped these bearing-down pains and other bad feelings, and has helped me in every way. I have so much faith in the Vegetable Compound that I keep it on hand all of the time and recommend it whenever I have the opportunity."—Mrs. LEWIS TROMBLEY, Sharon, Vermont.

Glad to Help Others

"I had pains in my back and sides for many months, and my work would have to be left undone at those times. My sister told me what good Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound was doing her, so I tried it, and from the third bottle I was well and every one thought I looked better. I am glad to help others regain their health, and you may use my testimonial."—MABEL HARTMANN, 1824 Greene Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Lesson for October 19

THE PARABLE OF THE SOWER

LESSON TEXT—Mark 4:1-20.

GOLDEN TEXT—The sower soweth the word.—Mark 4:14.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Garden of the Heart.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Good Soil for Good Seed.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—How to Receive and Use God's Word.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—How May I Improve the Soil of My Heart?

The method of teaching by parables was not employed by Jesus until the rulers had set their hearts against Him. When, in the light of His wonderful works, they turned against Him and attributed His works to the Devil (Mark 3:22) He denounced them in scathing terms and began to teach them by parables in fulfillment of Isaiah 6:10. The parabolic method of teaching makes clear the truth to those who love it and conceals it from those who dislike it.

A great multitude gathered to Him at the seaside (v. 1), so that, in order to escape the pressure of the crowd, He was obliged to enter a boat. From the boat as a pulpit He taught many things in parables. In this parable the sower and the seed are the same in all instances, but the results are entirely different. The difference lies in the condition of the soil. The central purpose of the teaching of this parable is to show that the results of preaching the Word depend upon the condition of the human heart.

I. The Wayside (vv. 4; 15).

The wayside means the track beaten down by the hoofs of animals and the feet of men. Because the soil was unbroken and uncultivated the seed could not get beneath the surface, therefore was devoured by the fowls that came along (v. 4). The great truth taught here is that the heart unbroken and hard is not fit soil for the Gospel. Such a heart it penetrates not, but lies loosely upon the surface. It is not recognized as God's means for restoring them unto Himself. While in this condition the evil one finds some way to snatch away the truth. The fowls that devour the seed represent the agents of Satan (v. 15).

II. The Stony Ground (vv. 5, 6; 16, 17).

This means not stones mixed with soil, but stones with a thin layer of soil on them. With such conditions a seed springs up quickly and likewise scorches quickly, as it has not much depth. The great lesson is that hearts superficially impressed receive the Word with joy, but when affliction or persecution arises for the Word's sake, immediately they are offended. They wither away and die.

III. The Thorny Ground (vv. 7; 18, 19).

In this case the ground is good, but has thorns in it. It is mellow enough and has sufficient depth, but has not been cleaned of the thorns. Such really hear the Word, but "the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in, choke the Word, and it becometh unfruitful" (v. 19). The thorny ground hearers of this age are those:

1. Who are so immersed in worldliness, business and anxious cares that the good seed cannot mature.

2. Who are rich. Anxious care in business brings riches and the effect of riches is to blunt the spiritual perception of men and women, thereby rendering them unsusceptible to the call of God, to higher things in life.

3. Who are running after the pleasures of life. All these things choke the Word. Many of the enjoyments of the world may be innocent in themselves, but they attract so much attention and consume so much energy and time that one has not time for Bible reading, meditation and prayer.

IV. The Good Ground (vv. 8; 20).

This ground differs from all the rest. It is soft and mellow, deep and moist; therefore, is capable of bringing forth fruit, some an hundred, some sixty and some thirty-fold, indicating different degrees of fruitfulness even of the good ground. In the measure that the heart is kept free from worldliness, riches and pleasure, the good seed matures.

Blaming Nature

You fall into the very common mistake of charging upon nature matters with which she has not the smallest connection, and for which she is in no way responsible. Men talk of nature as an abstract thing, and lose sight of what is natural while they do so.—Dickens.

Persian Philosophy

Miss Elisabeth Marbury praised, at a dinner in New York, the single life.

"Married life is so complicated," she said. "It is like the Persian story.

"A Persian, you know, used to buy six loaves of bread every day. Another Persian asked him why he did so. He answered:

"'One of the loaves I keep; one I throw away; two I return; two I lend.'

"'Complicated, most complicated,' said the other Persian. 'Can't you be a little clearer, effendi?'

"'Well,' said the first Persian, smiling, 'it's like this. The loaf I keep is for myself. The one I throw away is for my mother-in-law—may the foul fiends get her! The two I return are those I give my parents. The two I lend are those I give my children.'"—New York Mail.

Today Always One's Own

Today is the tomorrow of which, yesterday, you expected so much. It is up to you to fully realize your expectations. This means that upon you and you alone rests whether today shall be what you expect it to be, barring circumstances beyond your control.—Grit.

Many a man gains the upper hand by using underhand methods.

Skin so sore could not touch water to it

Resinol relieves it within few hours

Washington, D. C., Aug. 25:—"I am so grateful to you for your splendid products and for what they have accomplished for me that I feel I must give you the details.

In attempting to improve the appearance of my chin, I used a soap which had been recommended for that purpose but which proved to be too harsh for when I washed off the lather, the skin came with it. I applied cold cream, but the damage was too severe to yield to so mild an agent. My husband consulted our neighborhood druggist and asked if it would not be advisable to call in our family doctor. The druggist said: "You do not need a doctor in this case. Get a jar of Resinol Ointment and a cake of Resinol Soap and have your wife use them according to directions—they will beat everything else a hundred ways." So my husband bought the Resinol products and hopefully brought them home.

My skin was so tender and sore that I could not touch water to it, so I cleansed it gently first with pure olive oil and then applied the Resinol. I used a soft handkerchief that night for protection. In the morning, I bathed it gently with warm water and Resinol Soap, rinsing off with tepid water, and I could hardly believe that such a miracle of healing could occur during one night. The raw surface had filmed over and now looked only like a bad case of sunburn. I kept my face anointed with Resinol all that day and by night the improvement was so great that I was able to go out.

This experience is now only a memory for my face is softer, fairer and smoother than ever. A jar of Resinol is my best pal in the future and I will never be without it." (Signed) Mrs. C. P. Tapley, 1028 8th St., N. W.

Russian Tells of "Stone Age" Return

There are people in Russia today living in a "Stone age" all their own, according to reports of Prof. Leon Tann, a Russian ethnologist.

Professor Tann recently completed a tour of the wilds of Russia, and it was in the Jaroslav district that he found the peasantry utilizing stone for implements of numerous kinds for everyday usage where ordinary metal is now used.

Lack of iron and steel was attributed as the reason for this backward step, but Professor Tann was of the opinion that this stone work of today was far superior to the stone implements turned out by men thousands of years ago. The hatchets and axes of stone made by the Jaroslav natives were particularly well done and serviceable.

In the district of Orlow, Professor Tann found several communities where the natives virtually live without clothing of any kind all summer, and in winter hibernate in their huts and dens, and exist on potatoes, dried fish and dried watermelon rinds.

WHY DRUGGISTS RECOMMEND SWAMP-ROOT

For many years druggists have watched with much interest the remarkable record maintained by Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder medicine.

It is a physician's prescription.

Swamp-Root is a strengthening medicine. It helps the kidneys, liver and bladder do the work nature intended they should do.

Swamp-Root has stood the test of years. It is sold by all druggists on its merit and it should help you. No other kidney medicine has so many friends.

Be sure to get Swamp-Root and start treatment at once.

However, if you wish first to test this great preparation, send ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a sample bottle. When writing, be sure and mention this paper.—Advertisement.

Thought Little of Bishops' Prospects

Bishop Joseph F. Berry of the Indiana annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, says that recently he was presiding at a conference in which the assignment of one elderly minister was apparently not to his liking.

Leaving the church Bishop Berry said he chanced to be walking with a group of friends directly behind the disgruntled minister and his wife.

"Now, John," said the good wife, "don't worry. I've been to that town and it is not a bad place. They have a nice parsonage, and things could be much worse."

John apparently was not consoled for his wife continued:

"Maybe next year we'll get something better. We are getting old and will soon die and go to heaven, and thank God, John, there'll be no bishops there."—Indianapolis News.

Illusion Shattered

Twelve-year-old Joseph was talking to his bachelor uncle on the subject of girls. Uncle in a genial mood advised: "Now, if I were you, old fellow, I wouldn't get into any entanglements with girls until I was at least fifteen. I'd try to have a good time before I got mixed up with them."

Joseph shook his head. "Well, I've had one case already," he confessed, "but it's all over now."

Uncle pressed for a reason. And Joseph answered wisely and well, "I found out she wasn't what I thought she was."—Exchange.

Gold Hunger Supreme

Gold prospecting is very keen throughout Rhodesia and one night eight prospectors slept in the freezing cold on the site of a dead miner's forfeited gold claim in order to be the first to erect the customary discovery notice.

World's Blank Spots

Clay Hills of Southeastern Utah.

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

Adventurous souls sometimes deplore the supposed fact that there are no more worlds for exploration to conquer. But unknown things behind the known ages—the unexplored and little-known regions of the earth—are beckoning with that same force that drove Lief Ericson to America and Vasco da Gama around the Cape of Good Hope and Captain Cook to the sleepy, sunny islands of the South Pacific.

On our own North American continent there are places on the map which must necessarily remain practically blank, and many others whose uncharted topographic features are the products of vague reports and a fertile imagination. To the east of Hudson bay lies a peninsula shaped like the head of a woman, her high pompadour towering off in the direction of the Arctic ocean. It remains as much an enigma today as the eternal feminine has the reputation of being. Its westward flowing rivers and a village or two along its outward fringes are named, but its vast interior still offers the lure of hidden places. We call it the Ungava peninsula. Numerous other spaces on the Labrador peninsula are practically unknown off the few beaten trails.

The northern portion of Keewatin province, where the Arctic circle passes between Hudson bay and the various bays and inlets about the islands of the Canadian Arctic, remains as unlined by topographic symbols as a baby's brow. From Great Slave lake eastward to Dubawnt river and lake and northward from Lake Athabasca, there lies a vast area on which most maps show rivers and lakes which can only be outlined in the most hypothetical fashion.

One of the eight great river systems of the earth and the second greatest system on the North American continent drains an area about which we are almost entirely ignorant. The geological survey of Canada has been sending exploring parties into the MacKenzie river country, but the work has as yet been necessarily confined to the principal water routes. The stories told by the MacKenzie and Ogilvie ranges of mountains which feed the mighty stream are closed books. There are about 40,000 square miles of water area in the vicinity of the river, much of which is still unexplored and unmapped. Portions of the Canadian Rockies in northern British Columbia are so far as defiant in retaining their secrets as the invincible Mt. Everest.

Sections of our own Alaska may still call with their awful silence as strongly to the prospector and pioneer as the Yukon did in the days of the Klondike rush. The Endicott and Davidson ranges rear undefiled heads above the surrounding fringe of settlements on the Arctic ocean and the Yukon river.

Little Known Areas in States.

In the United States proper there are no areas which can properly be termed "unexplored." There are, however, numerous little-known areas perhaps traversed only once or twice in our history, and there are many areas which have not been surveyed. About a year ago it might have been said that the Clay Hills region of southeastern Utah was unexplored, but a party of the National Geographic society did work in the area in the summer of 1923. The Craters of the Moon area in Idaho has been adequately described only within the last two or three years.

In northern Minnesota along the Canadian border line there is a large area dotted with lakes about which very little is known. There are also little-known portions of New Mexico and Arizona, particularly where these states join the southeastern corner of Utah in the San Juan country, near the Chaco Canyon National monument upon which an expedition of the National Geographic society is working.

There are sections of southern and central Nevada which are very sparsely populated; and through portions of northern Wisconsin and Michigan one must travel with a compass. Newspapers have recently reported that an aerial photographic expedition is preparing to picture systematically the Olympic peninsula of Washington, parts of which are inaccessible.

Though most of Mexico is well known, there are some sections which have not been accurately surveyed. There are also jungles and mountains in Central America about which little is known. The San Blas country of Panama, for instance, though American airplanes have circled over it and a few individuals have penetrated it, holds secrets which are yet unfathomed.

The northeastern portion of Honduras, just behind the Mosquito coast, must be left blank on maps of that Central American republic, though rumors concerning the mountains, forests and uncivilized Indians of the interior reach us from time to time.

South America's Blank Regions.

South America has many square miles of territory which is yet untrodden by a white man. These include large portions of western and northwestern Brazil, the northwestern portion of Bolivia, areas in southern Argentina, and the Vaupes region in Colombia. There are certain routes across most of these areas which are fairly well known, but as soon as one leaves the beaten trail he reaches territory which has never been explored.

To the northwest of Paraguay between that country and Bolivia lies a vast tract of land often spoken of as the Paraguayan Chaco. It covers an area of at least 200,000 square miles, and is believed to be constituted mainly of swamps and jungles. A few merchants, who even today as they were in the days of the Phoenicians, are the pioneer explorers of distant and little-known areas, are about the only people who have ever visited the interior of the Chaco, lured there because it is the home of the quebracho tree, an important source of tannin.

The Oriente, the eastern portion of Ecuador, is inhospitable in its climate and choked with jungle, and few are the white men who have braved contact with its savage head-hunting natives to tell us the natural resources or even the physical features of this uncharted hinterland.

The story of every part of Europe is an open book, but Asia has its blank spots about which one can still wonder. Serene and invincible sit the Himalayas as the backbone of Asia, saving their snowslides and monsoons for any presumptuous person who tries to probe their secrets.

Two explorers of the National Geographic society within the last two or three years have been penetrating portions of western China in Yunnan, Szechuan and Kweichow provinces about which nothing much was known previous to this time. A few other explorers have been vying with them in putting these areas in detail on our maps. Kingdon Ward pushed from southwestern China across Tibet and northern India, outlining a route which had seldom been trod before.

Mongolia and the Gobi desert still have their secrets, though they have been revealing recently some of the most remarkable remains of dinosaurs and other prehistoric animals that have ever been discovered.

Africa Dark in Spots.

Africa is still "dark" in spots. There are great portions of the Sahara desert about which practically nothing is known, notably the Hank region, extending from latitude 22 degrees to 26 degrees near longitude 5 degrees west. It is inhabited by tribes that the French, for quite a while, have been trying to subdue. As a matter of fact, little is known about the western Sahara or about the southern and central portions of the Libyan desert. Hassanein Bey, an Egyptian explorer, has within the last year or two pushed his way across a hitherto unknown portion of the Libyan desert and placed upon our maps two previously doubtful oases and given us interesting data concerning a prehistoric people who once inhabited the hills about the oases.

Much of the area to the west of the Kufra oasis, which was explored by Mrs. Rosita Forbes and Hassanien Bey in 1921, still remains blank on our maps. There are also several places in the Belgian Congo where the white man has never been.

One of the world's wildest of wild spots is the interior of New Guinea, where it is said that 50,000 square miles of unexplored wilderness, peopled by head-hunters, pigmies and other tribes of ethnological interest are waiting for someone to come and find them.

Miss Jane Borrough

Harpersville, Alabama, Oct. 20—Miss Jane Borrough, age 71 years, died here very suddenly last Tuesday morning of heart failure. Miss Borrough was living with her brother, G. W. Borrough. She had been an invalid for forty years. She was a member of the Baptist church and was highly esteemed by all who knew her, and if she had an enemy it was never known. She was buried here, Rev. R. A. Kidd conducted the burial service. To the bereaved ones we extend our sympathy. R. B. Posey.

Mrs. Ellen Barnett

Saturday, October 4th the death angel visited the home of Mrs. W. C. Powell and called from her her mother, Mrs. Ellen Barnett. Mrs. Barnett had had the hand of affliction laid heavily upon her, having lost her eye sight and having been confined to her bed for three wears She was perhaps the oldest person living in the county, being nearly 100 years old. She leaves 1 daughter, three grand children and many more relatives and friends to mourn her departure.

I visited "Aunt Ellen" several times in her declining years, read the Scripture, talked with and prayed for her. The nearer she came to the river, the more anxious she was to hear the call, "Come over."

The mortal remains of Mrs. Barnett were laid away in the Four-mile cemetery. She was buried in less than 1 mile of where she was born. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. F P. Hewlett and myself.

Mrs. Powell wishes to thank her many friends for their kindnesses and help during her mother's illness and for the beautiful flowers laid on the grave. Her heart was made glad, even in that sad hour, by a liberal contribution from friends, to take care of the burial expense.

A Word From the Editor

Explanation.—After we had planned the paper for this week several advertisements were brought in which made it impossible for us to get in all the reading matter that we had ready. Please look for your self and see how crowded the paper is.

We learn that the people of Harpersville and Chelsea missed their papers last week. We are very sorry; don't know how it could have happened. We do know that we mailed their papers Thursday morning. Sincerely yours,

Luther Fowler, Editor.

Farm Bureau Meeting

The best Farm Bureau meeting ever held in the county, some of the directors said, was held at the court house, Thursday of last week Various phases of the work were discussed and plans were made for a better Farm Bureau in Shelby county. P. M. Henderson tendered his resignation as secretary and J. P. Montgomery was chosen to succeed him. Members of the bureau were guests of the Exchange Club of Columbiana at their luncheon at the Blackerby Hotel.

Fire Destroys Barn and Home

On Thursday of last week the barn of Mr. Chapman who lived on the Murphree farm in the Ebenezer community, was destroyed by fire. Ten head of live stock, corn hay, farm tools and wagon were lost. The fire occurred at a late hour of the night and was discovered by a neighbor family. The cause of the fire is not known.

On the following day a dwelling house in the same community was burned and practically all the contents lost. This fire was supposed to have started from the stove flue.

Columbiana Public School

The Parent-Teacher Association of Columbiana will give a Hallowe'en party at the public school building, Friday night, October 31st. An enjoyable program is promised. Proceeds will go to the public school.

NOTICE TO CONTRACTORS

State Project No. 44, Shelby county.

Sealed bids will be received by the State Highway Commission of Alabama at the office of the State Highway Department, Montgomery, Alabama, until 12:00 o'clock noon, November 26th, 1924, and at that time publicly opened for the construction of 8.104 miles of road from Calera to Wilton, by way of Montevallo, in the County of Shelby.

The principal items of work are approximately as follows;

ASSESSMENTS GO OVER A BILLION

1924 PROPERTY INCREASE OVER 1923 MORE THAN $43,000,000, ACCORDING TO REPORT TO GOVERNOR

Montgomery, Ala.—Ad valorem tax assessments in Alabama for the fiscal ending September 30, 1924, have reached the hitherto unprecedented grand total of $1,018,049,504. These total figures are contained in the report of the State Tax Commission for the fiscal year just closed, which report was submitted to Governor W. W. Brandon by Judge L. L. Herseberg, chairman of the commission.

Judge Herseberg states in his letter transmitting the report to the Chief Executive, that the tax year 1924, as compared with 1923, shows an increase in property other than motor vehicles of $35,901,229. In estimating the motor vehicle assessment the same for 1924 as for 1923, he says the gain over the figures in last year's report will be $43,291,603, as $7,390,374 was picked up from "escaped motor vehicles," this value not being included in the commission's report for last year. The motor vehicle regular assessment for 1923, it is stated, was $14,820,343 and that "escapes" gave an increase of 50 per cent.

In closing the report that announcement is made that the commission cannot speak too highly of the splendid support that assessors and Boards of Revenue have given the commission in the work of trying to secure a better quality and uniformity in the assessment and equalization of all property subject to taxation.

The department, it is stated, has completed checking the tax abstracts of assessment of all property in all of the counties with the exception of motor vehicles. Announcement is made that abstracts for motor vehicles will not be made out and sent in by assessors until After November 15, as under the present law the assessment and payment of taxes is made after the end of the tax year, instead of the assessment being made during the beginning of the tax year like other property as heretofore.

Smith, of the department of agriculture, visited Anniston for a conference relative to the establishment of a forest reserve on that part of the army reservation at Camp McClellan which is not to be used for military purposes. The visitors went to Anniston from Washington, D. C., to make an inspection of the camp site prior to drawing up a report to submit to the war department on the adaptability of the land at the army post for forestry growth. The government has for several years been seriously considering the merger of the area at Camp McClellan which is not being used for training purposes into a forest reserve, it is said, and it is thought that the report of the committee will be the last step which will be taken prior to a recommendation to this effect by the war department to the President.

The Alabama Public Service Commission has won a complete victory in its fight to obtain the restoration of its authority over intrastate rates on hay, cotton, clay, concrete and snale products and gravel, which it lost as a result of the decision of the interstate commerce commission in the famous Meridian rate case. Authority was returned by decision of the Federal Commission, a copy of which was received by the Public Service Commission. The immediate effect of the decision is to open a wide market for hay and other commodities produced in the Western section of Alabama, a market which was closed by the rupture of the rate fabric by the Meridian decision.

Frank Schwartz, a Gadsden boy, employed in the local steel mills, has just completed and patented an automatic electric fire alarm system for stores, factories and residences and all kinds of buildings where the fire hazard is great. The system is connected with the fire department.

BLOUSE AND TUNIC EXPLOITED; DAYTIME FROCKS IN VARIETY

A COSTUME made up of a plaited skirt worn with an overblouse, is as familiar as the A B C's and about as well established. The plaited skirt varies little, year in and out, but always pleads its cause with success, as a convenient companion piece to blouses of different sorts—for practical wear. But this fall we have plaited skirts constant to one overblouse, each wearing the sign of their union in pretty and novel decorations. One of these wholly charming and practical outfits is shown here and the chances are that many a woman will want one like it. It is of black satin with a unique trimming that is made of white crepe de chine in a fold, placed at each side of the skirt and at the front of the blouse. Over this there are tabs of black satin, each one held in place on the fold, by a flat, pearl button sewed to it. The same kind of trimming is made, using tan or ecru crepe de chine with black or other dark colors in satin. Handsome collar and cuffs of filet lace seem a better choice than any other—they are as chic and dependable as the blouse they finish. Business women will find this model worth considering.

Of Black Satin With Unique Trimming.

The last arrivals in day dresses show the tunic dress in many pretty versions. The tunic blouse has made a sweeping success and is developed in almost as many variations as the overblouse—it is usually worn with a plain, narrow skirt. By these means the slim, straightline modes are given further diversity.

Yes, we have no sameness in frocks for little Miss Eleven-or-So. Fashion says they must be simple, but may indulge in numberless ingenious "extras" to give them variety. The furore for diversity which dominates the grown-up modes in all apparel is almost as forceful in the realm of children's clothes. There is diversity in fabrics, in colors and color combinations, in trimmings and considerable of it in styles themselves.

For everyday frocks, twills, flannels, jersey cloth, kasha and velveteen are presented in a variety of patterns which include stripes, plaids, crossbar patterns, hairline stripes in two or three vivid colors and plain colors. Nearly all the frocks made of these cloths are cut on the simple lines shown here in a frock of striped flannel and many of them have collar and cuffs of heavy coarse natural linen. When hairline stripes are used pipings to match one of the colors in the stripes are effective. Thus a navy-blue twill with hairlines in red and green is piped with red silk and ornamented with a few round red buttons on the cuffs and at the throat. When a plain color is used the frock usually has embroidery in short bands or motifs as a finish and there are many frocks in which two plain colors are combined. Round necklines predominate and long or three-quarter length sleeves.

Cut on Simple Lines.

Besides these utility dresses "little miss" has afternoon frocks of crepe de chine or velveteen in dark colors. They are miniatures of some of the very simple grown-up patterns and are amusing because so diminutive. In these, sleeves are often half or three-quarter length. But her party frocks are "something else again"—as different as can be from those of older girls or grown people. For these crepe de chine, georgette crepe, thin silks and the filmiest laces are used, with ribbons and chiffon or artificial flowers in finishing touches.

Always men's qualities are shown by whether their powers and privileges make them proud or make them humble.

OLD-TIME RECIPES

We all enjoy a review of the good things of a generation or more ago; some of the dishes will never be equaled by any modern cookery.

Virginia Sweet Potato Pie.—Peel, boil and mash through a sieve five medium-sized sweet potatoes. Cream together one-fourth cupful of butter and one-half cupful of sugar, adding the well-beaten yolks of three eggs, the juice and grated rind of a lemon, with a pinch of cinnamon. Add the potato with one cupful of rich milk, fold in the beaten whites of the eggs and pour into a pie plate lined with flaky crust. Bake in a moderate oven, taking care that the top does not become too brown before the filling is sufficiently cooked.

Brunswick Stew.—In the early days in Brunswick county hunters prepared this Virginia dish, using squirrels as the meat for the stew. When squirrels are not to be obtained, chicken or lamb is substituted: Cut the meat into serving-sized pieces, dip into flour. Place an iron kettle over the fire and into it place a layer of coarsely chopped salt pork; over this add a layer of thinly sliced onion, next a layer of parboiled potatoes, a layer of green corn cut from the cob (canned corn may be used), and finally a layer of lima beans. Now place the meat in the kettle and repeat with another layer of the pork, onion and other vegetables, then pour over two quarts of boiling water, cover and place the kettle where it will just simmer for three or four hours. Now add a quart of tomatoes cut into pieces, two teaspoonfuls of sugar, a tablespoonful of salt, pepper to taste, cover and cook another hour. Thicken the gravy with flour and butter rubbed to a paste, adding more seasoning if needed; simmer until the gravy is cooked and the stew is ready to serve. This makes a large kettleful but is good reheated if the family do not consume it all the first day.

Roast Oysters.—This is a typical Washington dish. Select large oysters, scrub the shells well, place in a dripping pan in a hot oven, or on top of a coal range. When the shells begin to open, remove to a hot platter and serve at once with melted butter.

Terrapin.—Plunge the terrapin, shell and all, into a kettle of rapidly boiling water. Leave until the meat begins to loosen from the shell, then drain and cool. Remove the shell and take out the gall and entrails—all the rest is edible. Cut the meat into small pieces, retaining all the juice which thus escapes; mix this juice with two or three tablespoonfuls of butter, half a glass of currant jelly, a tablespoonful of worcestershire, two tablespoonfuls of lemon juice, and salt and cayenne to taste. No pepper with terrapin. Mix the sauce and add the terrapin meat and simmer for a few minutes; now add a cupful of thick rich cream and cook until hot, then serve at once.

He had been walking down a street modest homes; the bare trees ped into a sky clear and blue with first chill presage of winter. A k step fell unheeded by his side; girl passed, hesitated, then turned spoke.

"You are preoccupied, Mr. Grant."

"Oh, Miss Bruce, I beg your pardon. m glad to see you." Even at that ment he had been thinking of Zen, perhaps he put more cordiality his words than he intended. But had grown to have considerable re- d, on her own account, for this un- usual girl who was not afraid of him. He had found that she was what he called "a good head." "You do not often visit our part of the city," she essayed.

"You live here?"

"Nearby. Will you come to see?"

He turned with her at a corner, and they went up a narrow street lying deep in dead leaves. Friendly domestic glimpses could be caught through unblinded windows.

"This is our home," she said, stopping before a little gate. Grant's eye followed the pathway to a cottage set back among the trees. "I live here with my sister and brother and mother. Father is dead," she went on hurriedly, as though wishing to place before him a quick digest of the family affairs, "and we keep up the home by living on with mother as boarders; that is, Grace and I do. Hubert is still in high school. Won't you come in?"

He followed her up the path and into a little hall, lighted only by chance rays falling through a half-opened door. She did not switch on the current, and Grant was aware of a comfortable sense of her nearness, quite distinct from any office experience, as she took his hat. In the living-room her mother received him with visible surprise. She was not old, but widowhood and the cares of a young family had whitened her hair before its time.

"We are glad to see you, Mr. Grant," she said. "It is an unexpected pleasure. Big business men do not often—"

"Mr. Grant is different," her daughter interrupted, lightly. "I found him wandering the streets and I just—retrieved him."

"I think I am different," he admitted, as his eye took in the surroundings, which he appraised quickly as modest comfort, attained through many little economies and makeshifts.

"Phyllis is a great help to me—and Grace," the mother observed. "I hope she is a good girl in the office."

At this moment Grace and Hubert came in from the picture-show together, and the conversation turned to lighter topics. Mrs. Bruce insisted on serving tea and cake, and when Grant found that he must go Phyllis accompanied him to the gate.

"This all seems so funny," she was saying. "You are a very remarkable man."

"I think I once passed a similar opinion about you."

She extended her hand, and he held it for a moment. "I have not changed my first opinion," he said, as he released her fingers and turned quickly down the pavement.

CHAPTER XI

Grant's first visit to the home of his private stenographer was not his last, and the news leaked out, as it is sure to do in such cases. The social set confessed to being on the point of being shocked. Two schools of criticism developed over the five o'clock tea tables; one held that Grant was a gay dog who would settle down and marry in his class when he had had his fling, and the other that Phyllis Bruce was an artful hussy who was quite ready to sell herself for the Grant millions. And there were so many eligible young women on the market, although none of them were described as artful hussies!

Grant's behavior, however, placed him under no cloud in so far as social opportunities were concerned; on the contrary, he found himself being showered with invitations, most of which he managed to decline on the grounds of pressure of business. When such an excuse would have been too transparent he accepted and made the best of it, and he found no lack of encouragement in the one or two incipient amorous flurries which resulted. From such positions he always succeeded in extricating himself, with a quiet smile at the vagaries of life. He had to admit that some of the young women whom he had met had charms of more than passing moment; he might easily enough find himself chasing the rainbow. . . .

But his attention was at once to be turned to very different matters. A stock market, erratic for some days, went suddenly into a paroxysm. Grant escaped with as little loss as possible for himself and his clients, and after three sleepless nights called his staff together. They crowded into the board-room, curious, apprehensive, almost frightened, and he looked over them with an emotion that was quite new to his experience. Even in the aloofness which their standards had made it necessary for him to adopt there had grown up in his heart, quite unnoticed, a tender, sweet foliage of love for these men and women who were a part of his machine. Now, as he looked in their faces he realized how, like little children, they leaned on him—how, like little children, they feared his power and his displeasure—how, perhaps, like little children, they had learned to love him, too. He realized, as he had never done before, that they were children; that here and there in the mass of humanity is one who was born to lead, but the great mass itself must be children always, doing as they are bid.

"My friends," he managed to say, "we suddenly find ourselves in tremendous times. Some of you know my attitude toward this business in which we are engaged. I did not seek it; I tried to avoid it; yet, when the responsibility was forced upon me I accepted that responsibility. I gave up the life I enjoyed, the environment in which I found delight, the friends I loved. Well—our nation is now in a somewhat similar position. It has to go into a business which it did not seek, of which it does not approve, but which fate has thrust upon it. It has to break off the current of its life and turn it into undreamed-of channels, and we, as individuals who make up the nation, must do the same. I have already enlisted, and expect that within a few hours I shall be in uniform. Some of you are single men of military age; you will, I am sure, take similar steps. For the rest—the business will be wound up as soon as possible, so that you may be released for some form of national service. You will all receive three months' salary in lieu of notice. Mr. Murdoch will look after the details. When that has been done my wealth, or such part of it as remains, will be placed at the disposal of the government. If we win it will be well invested in a good cause; if we lose, it would have been lost anyway."

No one knew just how the meeting broke up, but Grant had a confused remembrance of many handclasps and some tears. He was not sure that he had not, perhaps, added one or two to the flow, but they were all tears of friendship and of an emotion born of high resolve. . . .

As he stood in his own office again, trying to get the events of these last few days into some sort of perspective, Phyllis Bruce entered. He motioned dumbly to a chair, but she came and stood by his desk. Her face was very white and her lips trembled with the words she tried to utter.

"I can't go," she managed to say at length.

"Can't go? I don't understand?"

"Hubert has joined," she said.

"Hubert, the boy! Why, he is only in school—"

"He is sixteen, and large for his age. He came home confessing, and saying it was his first lie, and the first important thing he ever did without consulting mother. He said he knew he wouldn't be able to stand it if he told her first."

"Foolish, but heroic," Grant commented. "Be proud of him. It takes more than wisdom to be heroic."

"And Grace is going to England. She was taking nursing, you know, and so gets a preference. We can't all leave mother."
